Tainted farm irrigation runoff is believed to be the source of contamination at most of the sites, the Bee said.

Selenium is a trace element that is found naturally in the soil, and can enter bodies of water through runoff. In very small amounts, it is an essential part of the diet for humans and some animals, but it can be toxic in higher concentrations.

Hazardous levels of selenium earlier had been found at the Kesterson National Wildlife Refuge in central California.

The Bee said federal officials found fish with selenium levels up to six times higher than is considered safe for humans in the Salton Sea in California, the Benton and Freezeout lakes in Montana, Stewart Lake and Green River in Utah, and the lower Colorado River.

walking toward Ottawa. He said McBride took him to dinner and paid for him to stay in a hotel.

"When I was signing in, I felt a hand going into my back pocket," Marrs said. He said McBride put a $20 bill in his pocket and when he tried to give it back, McBride told him if he didn't need the money he could donate it to cancer research.

"I could just see that he was really concerned about me," Marrs said. He said they have kept in touch ever since.

The idea of a scholarship was initiated by John Keltz, 1953 K-State alumnus and Sublette postmaster. He said Marrs spoke in 1983 at the Kansas Postmasters State Convention in Wichita.

"After his talk was over, he had touched each one of us so much..." he said.

Keltz said during his studies he became familiar with the cancer center. He contacted Terry Johnson, director of the center and Pat Adams, administrative assistant for the biology division, to create the scholarship.

McBride said Marrs has only a few months left to live, but the walkathon for cancer research will continue forever.

When Marrs climbed into the van headed for Lawrence, he said Kansas postmasters and others that have helped him have been "the best friends I've ever had."

"For the ones who aren't here, tell them I love them," he said.

Marrs said he decided to make his 97-day walk after learning that Terry Fox, a 22-year-old Canadian who lost one of his legs to cancer, attempted to run across Canada with an artificial leg to raise money for the Canadian Cancer Society. His run was cut short when cancer spread to his lungs, killing him.

"I decided to walk the remaining distance of his heroic mission through the United States," Marrs said in an article he wrote for "Accepting a Challenge," a publication compiled by the Center for Basic Cancer Research.

Marrs said he met many people during his walk and has given hundreds of speeches about his experiences.

"I just tell them about my walk and what a fantastic experience it was to get to know America in a real personal way and to get to know that people are so good everywhere," he said.

When Marrs, a born-again Christian, started his crusade he did not make prior arrangements, but prayed to God to provide him with necessities, he said.

Donned in a shirt, "Fighting Cancer Every Step of the Way," Marrs was stopped on the road by people who gave him food, shelter and encouragement, he said.

He said he was able to make the trip by help from "those precious people."

Referring to his experience, Marrs said he wishes "everyone in the country could get a taste of what this country is really all about."

Marrs said he met McBride while

Afghan officials arrest, imprison former leader

By The Associated Press

BEIJING — Former Afghan leader Babrak Karmal has been arrested in Afghanistan and is in prison, China's government-run Xinhua News Agency reported Sunday.

The agency quoted diplomatic sources in Islamabad, Pakistan, as saying that Karmal was sent to Pul-e-charkhai Jail in the Afghan capital of Kabul.

Xinhua said the order to arrest Karmal, the former Afghan president and secretary-general of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, came from the ruling Revolutionary Council of Afghanistan.

Karmal, 58, headed the council during the nearly seven years he was in power.

Xinhua said the reason for Karmal's arrest was not known. The diplomatic sources were not identified.

In Moscow, an official with the Afghan Embassy was asked about the report.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, he replied: "I haven't heard about that. As far as I know, I think it's not correct."

The official said the Xinhua report might be "propaganda from imperialists."

China has aided Moslem guerrillas who are battling Afghan government troops and an estimated 115,000 Soviet soldiers in Afghanistan.

Officials in Afghanistan, and leaders of the Afghan anti-Marxist guerrilla groups operating from bases in Pakistan, could not immediately be reached for comment.

Monitors of Radio Kabul, the official Afghan radio, did not report hearing any announcement that might indicate Karmal was imprisoned.

Xinhua said Karmal had been under house arrest "for some time."

Karmal was established as Afghan party leader, the country's top post, on Dec. 27, 1979, when his predecessor, Hafizullah Amin, was killed in a coup reportedly backed by the Soviet Union. The Soviets at the same time sent 80,000 troops into the country.

Amin had succeeded Nur Mohammed Taraki, himself killed. The Communists came to power in Afghanistan in April 1979, when President Mohammed Daoud was killed.

Karmal's disappearance from the political scene in Afghanistan has been a gradual one that some Western analysts said was orchestrated by the Kremlin in an effort to contain unrest among his supporters.

On May 4, 1986, Karmal was removed as party leader but kept the titular presidency and membership on the ruling Politburo.

40mm grenade launchers and larger, rocket-propelled grenades. Some carried 9mm pistols.

There also was evidence of the U.S. military training that accompanied last year's aid package.

Weapons were cleaned and oiled at least once a day. Discipline and morale appeared good, and camp sanitation was adequate.

Rebels interviewed ranged in age from 14 to 56.

Virtually all said they were farmers and spoke of what they called Sandinista repression — the relocation of families from combat areas to prevent collaboration with the Contras; pressure on farmers to give up their private land and join cooperatives; attacks against the Roman Catholic Church.

Henry, 28, of Boaco, has been fighting with the rebels for four years because, he says, "We can't work our land and we don't have any liberty. That's all I want for Nicaragua — liberty, just liberty."

Panchito, the guide, was educated as a commercial artist in the United States and returned to take up arms with the rebels two years ago.

He put his cause simply: "I am here because I am a Nicaraguan."

"Remember, the Sandinistas did not control any territory until the people rose up against (former dictator Anastasio) Somoza and joined them."

resulted in some speech impairment.

Hungerford said Tuesday that not telling Jackson about the problems that could result from the incident immediately after it happened was a departure from standard medical procedure.

In his final argument, Jackson's attorney, Richard Cordry of Wichita, raised the question of why no local dentists had testified in Hungerford's defense.

The 12-member jury went into deliberation at 12:30 p.m. and returned the unanimous verdict — Hungerford was at fault — at 4 p.m. One juror, an alternate, was dismissed before deliberation began.

Cordry said although he had originally requested about $200,000 in damages, he was pleased with the $75,000 figure. Ten of the 12 jurors had agreed on the amount.

"For this area and this type of case, it's a fair amount," he said. "I think the jury did an excellent job."

They were very interested in the case, and they understood very well."

Jackson said she was also satisfied.

"I feel justice has been served," she said.

Cordry said Jackson's dental expenses totaled about $5,090, while the trial expenses would be about $10,000.

Hungerford graduated from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln and has practiced dentistry in Manhattan about nine years.

"I just kept talking to him, trying to calm him down," Ray said.

Ray said after Denizio heard Hayden and Vrbas escape, he opened the front door and watched them run across the street.

Ray said Denizio then wanted to make up a story to tell the police. Denizio cut the telephone cord so Ray could not call the police.

After they talked a while longer, Denizio "finally threw the knife," and Ray ran out of the house.

Ray said when the police entered the house Denizio was in the kitchen "sitting there eating a bowl of chili."

The bowl covered the cut in the table made when Denizio threw the knife which he had hidden in a kitchen drawer, Ray said.

Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department said the motive of the attack has not been determined.

Hayden and Vrbas were admitted to The St. Mary Hospital, 1823 College Ave., Friday and released later in the day after being treated.

operation, saying that as trained intelligence officers "we believe in the need-to-know principle. I had no need to know."

It remains unclear, then, why Rodriguez turned to the vice president's office if he was excluding Gregg from information because of the need-to-know principle.

Gregg first said after the Hasenfus plane was downed that he had never discussed Nicaragua with Rodriguez. Bush later told CBS-TV's "60 Minutes" that Gregg had to change his story because "he forgot."

Bush himself met three times with Rodriguez, a veteran of the CIA's ill-fated Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961, according to the vice president's account. But he said they did not discuss the Contra aid network. Rodriguez even attended a staff Christmas party in Gregg's office in 1985.

One former White House official familiar with the NSC operations said Gregg was more closely related to Rodriguez's work with North and the Contra supply network than Gregg has indicated.

This official, speaking only on condition of anonymity, said Gregg "clearly was the godfather of Rodriguez. He's the one that brokered the introduction (to North), pressed him on him, said, 'Look, he's a great guy. Use him.'"

This official said another person on the vice president's staff, military assistant Lt. Col. E. Douglas Menarchik, was in "direct contact" with North, "encouraging and monitoring" his operation. Menarchik was said by his office to be unavailable for comment.

The vice president's account said Rodriguez never mentioned the diversion of money to the Contras from the administration's sale of arms to Iran and there was no indication he knew of such a diversion.

The vice president was aware, however, of the Iranian arms sales.

In Jerusalem last July 29, Bush met with Amiram Nir, adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who was the Israeli contact on the arms sales, in a session unknown to most of the vice president's own staff and traveling party.

Thanks to all those groups that made Sigma Chi Derby Days a great success!

WE'RE PAYING CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS NOW!

SELL YOUR BOOKS AT VARNEY'S (regardless of where you bought them) AND GET YOUR YELLOW TOKEN

- ★Get your yellow token, which is good for 10% off any non-textbook items, when you sell your books during dead week or final week. You decide what the token is worth by the amount you purchase. THE MORE YOU BUY THE MORE YOU SAVE! You can use the token whenever you want. Use it for Christmas purchases or use it next semester.
- ★Bring all your books to Varney's (regardless of where you bought them) and our buyers will value them individually. You choose what you want to sell! WE BUY BOOKS EVERY DAY! However, you can usually get the most for your books by selling them to us at the end of the semester.
- ★The price we pay for books is determined mainly by two factors—if the books will be used again at K-State and if we need the books for our stock. If we cannot buy your books for our stock, we will offer you the best price we can, based on the national market.
- ★Remember, it's what you get for all your books that counts, and we think that the wholesaler we buy for pays the highest prices.
- ★We know you're busy and in a hurry so we have four buyers to take care of you. We try to keep the time you spend in line to a minimum. We also buy until 9 at night during dead week and until 10 at night during final week.

Court indicts Conrail driver

By The Associated Press

TOWSON, Md. — A grand jury Monday returned a 16-count manslaughter indictment against the engineer of the Conrail locomotive that collided with a passenger train and killed 16 people in the worst accident in Amtrak's history.

Ricky L. Gates of Essex operated his unit of three Conrail locomotives in a "grossly negligent manner" in what amounted to a "wanton or reckless disregard for human life," according to the Baltimore County grand jury.

The Jan. 4 accident near Chase also injured 175 people.

After 21 years of "working with fine students," Homer Dodge Caine, assistant professor of music, will retire at the end of the semester.

Considering his varied activities while at K-State, Caine said he enjoyed working with music students and would miss them the most.

"Music is all I've known in my life," Caine said. Both his mother and father were music instructors, and he has been surrounded by music since childhood, he said.

Caine has served as director of music education for 10 years. He supervised the music student teachers, working as administrative assistant to the head of the Department of Music from 1976-1982. During the past 21 years, he taught music classes and gave private lessons in violin, viola and flute.

Caine also played with K-State's resident string quartet until 1982.

Caine began playing the piano at age 4. At 12, he began giving music lessons to younger students his father had put in his charge.

After graduating from Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, Caine joined the Navy during World War II. While in the Navy, he performed with the Honolulu Symphony as a member of the violin section in such places as Honolulu and the Great Lakes area.

As an undergraduate, Caine said he preferred to perform. He added that he was fortunate to be able to pursue this kind of lifestyle after the war ended.

Caine worked for several years as a professional musician in Chicago. He played in a society dance band called the Griff Williams Dance Orchestra from 1945-1947. With this band, he performed in such places as the Palmer House in Chicago and the Waldorf Astoria in New York City. "We were traveling all the time," Caine said. GO TO THE MOVIES WITH DEG...

On August 7, Shadø Stevens hits the screen as "TRAXX" ex-mercenary turned local hero in a bang-up spoof mixing elements of "Rambo" with "Dirty Harry." Priscilla Barnes co-stars as the mayor who hires Traxx to clean up her sleazy little town in the side-splitting comedy written by Gary DeVore ("Running Scared").

Then charm meets enchantment when a female angel splash-lands in a suburban backyard swimming pool. The unexpected landing by French actress Emmanuelle Beart prompts Michael Knight (the previously famed Tad on "All My Children") to disengage his fiancée, Phoebe Cates, and engage in his "DATE WITH AN ANGEL" — an ethereal, romantic comedy.

The dramatic story of "WEEDS" stars Nick Nolte as a prison convict whose passion for theatre wins him his freedom and rekindles his zest for life. The dynamic mixture of drama, comedy and music creates an energetic tale of friendship in an effort to win against the odds.

It's wild, romantic comedy, however, which closes out DEG's movie presentations in '87. "ILLEGALLY YOURS" brings Rob Lowe to the movies as a young and debonaire juror who discovers that the female defendant charged with murder is his grade-school girlfriend. The ensuing pursuit of love and justice falls under the direction of Peter Bogdanovich ("What's Up Doc?," "The Last Picture Show," and "Mask").

From the heavenly splendor in October, comes down-to-earth hilarity in November with "COLLISION COURSE." Top comedian Jay Leno (whom David Letterman describes as "the funniest comedian working today") and Pat Morita ("Karate Kid I and II" and TV's "OHARA") join forces as an American policeman and his culturally polarized Japanese counterpart. Their investigative tactics collide in comedy at every outrageous turn of events during their action-packed investigation into the murder of a Japanese businessman in Detroit.

HOW TO WIN $1,000,000 IN CASH!

MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY is the movie that can make it happen for you. $1,000,000 in cash will be awarded to one lucky person.

In the upcoming motion picture release, MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY, four million dollars has been hidden, a million at a time. During the course of the movie, three of the millions are found. That leaves $1,000,000 for you to find...

Your challenge is to determine where the missing money is hidden. You'll need to figure out the city, state, site, exact location, and the container, in which the money is hidden. Note: No actual money is hidden. The missing money is fictional. But the million dollars in cash that you win if you solve the mystery is very real.

No purchase necessary. For more information see specially marked Glad® packages. "Dr. Lynch has been very instrumental in the development of new activities sponsored by Ag Council through his complete commitment in seeing that students do have support and guidance from the faculty."

Rotarians must allow women

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, in a ruling hailed as a major breakthrough for sexual equality, said Monday that states may force Rotary International to admit women as members.

The 7-0 decision, while applying only to Rotary clubs, suggested that numerous other male-only or female-only private organizations may have to comply with state laws requiring equal access to "public accommodations."

The justices upheld a California law that bars Rotary International from ousting local chapters that have women members.

In an opinion written by Justice Lewis F. Powell, the court broadened the impact of a 1984 ruling that states may force the Jaycees to admit women as full members.

Powell said a California public accommodations law applies to Rotary clubs because they are sizable, have a high turnover rate, engage in public activities, encourage participation by non-members and welcome news media coverage of many of their central activities.

He said the law does not interfere with the rights of Rotarians to associate with whom they please.

Deputy Attorney General Marian M. Johnston of California said the ruling could have a dramatic impact on breaking down barriers for traditionally men-only groups.

"I think the decision makes it clear if a group is involved in public sector affairs, it cannot claim immunity from state regulation," she said.

"Symbolically it also has tremendous importance," she added.

In another decision, the court ruled that juries should not use local standards in deciding whether allegedly obscene material is entitled to free-speech protection because it has redeeming value.

The 6-3 decision in an Illinois case could make it more difficult to convict the sellers of sexually explicit materials.

Lynn Hecht Schafran of the National Organization for Women Legal Defense and Education Fund said the Rotary ruling recognizes the importance of social contacts in promoting business success.

She said she hopes other business-oriented groups similar to Rotary will now "gracefully acknowledge what they really are" and admit women as full members. "The court has settled the question," she said.

While the court provided no checklist on what groups may be affected, among those that expressed interest in the case were Kiwanis International, Lions clubs, the Elks, Moose clubs, the U.S. Improved Order of Red Men and the Boy Scouts.

Candidates present opinions during forums Coliseum 'should be competitive'

By TOM DENZEL
Collegian Reporter

The Fred Bramlage Coliseum will never draw larger crowds than a facility in Kansas City, but it should be competitive, said the first of four candidates vying for the newly created position of director of the coliseum.

"Manhattan is a crossroads between two major marketplaces," said Mark A. North Monday morning to students, staff and faculty gathered in the Union. "It's a good stopping point. It can never out-perform the likes of marketplaces like Kansas City (and Wichita), but it can compete well with them."

North is the director of operations at the Lawlor Events Center at the University of Nevada, Reno. He said he believes his responsibilities are to sell the coliseum to agencies and promoters.

North outlined some objectives he would pursue if appointed director of the coliseum.

"Researching the history of K-State and the surrounding areas" wants would be first a priority of mine," he said.

The position of coliseum director is a unique challenge to North.

"It's sort of a cross between Iowa State (University) and the University of Nevada, Reno," he said.

At Iowa State, North was assistant technical director of the James H. Hilton Coliseum.

"The Bramlage Coliseum is self-supporting and subsidized," he said. "The two (Bramlage Coliseum and the cross between Iowa State and the University of Nevada) complement each other, making for a very interesting opportunity."

Even though he has an open-door policy with his employees, he said he does not broadcast his policy to the employees.

"I don't feel that employees always react favorably toward it," North said. "If my door is open, then they are more than welcome to come

Variety contributes to liberal arts

By CHRIS HALL
Collegian Reporter

Developing a strong arts and sciences college is not inconsistent with the purposes of the land grant university, Edward L. McGlone, fourth of five candidates for the position of dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said Monday.

McGlone, dean of Arts and Sciences at Mississippi State University, Starkville, addressed faculty members Monday afternoon in Willard Hall 114.

"The land-grant institution was developed to educate, not to provide vocational training," he said.

Variety and diversification contribute to the quality of an academic program, he said.

Striving for good teaching programs, challenging students academically, encouraging research and developing standards for assessing quality other than enrollment and credit hours are important for a university, McGlone said.

"We (in arts and sciences) need to be more aggressive about defending opportunities to reflect and create," he said.

In his seven years at Mississippi State, McGlone said he has seen the state's efforts to eliminate problems. It is important to resist the pressure to make decisions prematurely, he said.

"Personality and politics must rank below reason for the basis of decision-making," McGlone said.

After becoming dean at Mississippi State, McGlone said, he visited with all the departments and standing and special committees to better understand the problems and people of the school.

In addition, McGlone stressed the importance of developing the intellectual powers of students and a global awareness in students to better understand international problems.

William P. Weber, final candidate for the position, will address faculty from 3:30 to 5 p.m. Thursday in Willard 114.

Pope finishes W. German tour

SPEYER, West Germany — Pope John Paul II ended his West German visit Monday with a call for religious freedom in the Soviet bloc and praise for those who opposed the "mass hysteria and propaganda" of the Nazi era.

John Paul said free exercise of religion is "one of man's basic rights" and is needed to form "a new united Europe from the Atlantic to the Ural Mountains" deep inside Soviet territory.

He also warned young women against what he termed "false freedom" of the feminist movement, and he listened intently as Bishop Martin Kruse, the nation's top-ranking Protestant, blamed religious leaders themselves for lack of Christian unity.

John Paul, 66-year-old spiritual leader of the world's 800 million Roman Catholics, flew back to Rome on Monday night after a meeting with West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl in Speyer, near the French border. Details of the private talks were not made available.

Kohl and his wife, Hannelore, both dressed in heavy winter coats, were among the 55,000 people who stood in 46-degree weather for the last Mass of the pontiff's trip.

In a farewell address shortly before the pope left for his flight from Stuttgart, Kohl told the pope: "You have brought us a message of hope."

Car, truck collision kills 4 children

JETMORE — Four children were killed Monday when a Hodgeman County School District station wagon collided with a loaded cattle truck in western Kansas, authorities said.

Killed were Andrea Querbach, 7; Joshua Tarman, 6; Anisa Torrez, 6; and Jeremiah Rasmussen, 7, all of Jetmore, Kansas Highway Patrol Trooper Morgan Wright said.

The school vehicle was headed north on a county road about two miles west of Jetmore when it collided with a cattle truck westbound on U.S. 156, Wright said. The truck belonged to Speedway Transportation of Holdrege, Neb.

The driver of the truck, Donald Musgrave of Indianola, Neb., said the school vehicle stopped at a stop sign and then pulled out in front of the truck, Wright said.

Emporians respond to TV movie

EMPORIA — Some thought it was boring, others termed it fascinating, but just about everybody in town wanted to see the television movie about a celebrated murder case involving an Emporia minister, his secretary and their slain spouses.

The first segment of the two-part miniseries "Murder Ordained" was broadcast Sunday night, and a police officer out for an evening jog said the city was quiet while it was on the air.

"I was out running and there was almost nobody on the streets," said Capt. Bruce Fair. "About 10 cars passed me, and I ran over six miles."

The CBS miniseries, which concludes with another two-hour segment Tuesday night, spotlights the case of Thomas Bird, former pastor of Faith Lutheran Church in Emporia, and his secretary and lover, Lorna Anderson Eldridge.

Both are now in prison. Bird is serving one term on a conspiracy conviction in a plot to kill Martin Anderson, Eldridge's former husband, and a life term for the murder of his wife, Sandra.

Aliens hope for U.S. citizenship

Thousands of illegal aliens appeared eager to apply for amnesty when the program begins Tuesday but many were expected to hold back, weighing their fears of the U.S. government against the promise of U.S. citizenship.

"We've had 200 to 300 calls so far this morning," said Armando Villegas, one of 12 new workers staffing the Immigration and Naturalization Service's new legalization office in Memphis, Tenn.

Al Giugni, INS district director in El Paso, Texas, said about 20 people showed up at the application center Monday morning and had to be turned away.

The Los Angeles Catholic Archdiocese says it already has registered 285,000 aliens who intend to seek amnesty.

The federal law offers amnesty only to those who entered the United States illegally before Jan. 1, 1982, and have maintained their residence here continuously. They may apply any time within the next 12 months.

Among the estimated 3 million eligible people, mistrust of the INS remained a large obstacle.

Truck 'splits open' bus, kills 7

BEAUMONT, Texas — A Trailways bus and an 18-wheel truck collided on a rain-slick interstate highway Monday, killing at least seven people and injuring 15, police said.

A Trailways ticket agent said the truck "jumped the median and apparently hit it (the bus) broadside."

"The bus reportedly split open," said Beaumont police Sgt. Joe Hebert.

The accident occurred about 1:50 p.m. on Interstate 10 in Beaumont, fire department dispatcher Bill Weiblinger said. He said there was a "heavy downpour" at the time.

Beaumont police officer Ky Brown said at least seven people were confirmed dead.

The accident occurred in the westbound lanes of the highway, which was closed to traffic after the crash, officials said. Seven ambulance units were at the scene, along with several fire department trucks, Weiblinger said.

Michael Wright, a Trailways ticket agent in Beaumont, said officials believed the bus driver was pinned inside the vehicle and about 20 people were on board at the time of the crash.

"All we know is the bus was heading for Houston and an 18-wheeler jumped the median and apparently hit it broadside," Wright said.

The bus was leaving Beaumont and was headed for Houston, he said.

Hart's companion denies affair

MIAMI — Miami model and actress Donna Rice on Monday denied she spent Friday night with Democratic presidential front-runner Gary Hart at his Washington townhouse and called their weekend activities "all very innocent."

"I don't know if he was attracted to me, but there was nothing between us," the 29-year-old South Carolina native said in an interview. "I'm more attracted to younger men."

The Miami Herald reported Sunday that a woman, later identified as Rice, "spent Friday night and most of Saturday" with Hart at his Capitol Hill townhouse, while Hart's wife, Lee, was in Denver. But the paper said Monday that its reporters left the back entrance to Hart's house uncovered for a time.

Hart, whose presidential campaigns have been dogged by rumors about his personal life, has denied any "personal relationship" with Rice and denied he spent Friday night with anyone at his home.

Fraud case ends with 12 guilty

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A federal judge rejected a plea for probation and sentenced the final defendant in the multimillion-dollar Culture Farms fraud case to 18 months in prison Monday.

U.S. District Judge Earl E. O'Connor disregarded the recommendation from a prosecutor and the request of the defendant, Gert A. Theron, 49, a South African living in Mission Viejo, Calif., that he be given probation.

Theron, the last of 12 defendants, cooperated in the federal investigation and told the judge Monday that he was broke and supporting his family on borrowed money.

The government contended that shell corporations controlled by the defendants bilked as much as $100 million from as many as 30,000 investors in more than 30 states during 1984 and 1985 in a scheme involving homegrown milk cultures allegedly used in the manufacture of cosmetics.

Investors were required to purchase a minimum of $350 worth of culture kits from Activator Supply Co. and told they could expect to receive about $900 after growing the cultures at home and reselling the substance to Culture Farms Inc. of Lawrence, Kan., for use in a new cosmetic product.

U.S. Attorney Ben Burgess said in 1985 when indictments were returned against the 12 defendants that "the only demand for the cultures was the demand created by the defendants for the purpose of inducing investors to purchase activators."

Gripping stress accompanies finals

By TIM STALEY
Collegian Reporter

On a college campus a week before finals, sources of stress are everywhere.

"It's everywhere, especially in a university," he said.

If stress isn't released, Egerton said, it can reach a point where it causes physical illnesses.

Stress affects people in different ways.

"I don't think stress affects how I do on my tests," said Lisa Joyce, sophomore in elementary education. "If I know it, I know it. If I don't, I don't."

She said she is usually stressed when it comes time for a test but added that she is usually "stressed about everything."

Chet Lockard, junior in environmental design, said he is usually stressed until finishing a test, but this year his finals are spread out enough so that he won't have to worry about heightened stress.

To lower stress levels, Egerton listed several methods: sleeping right, eating right, exercising and allowing time for mental breaks.

Egerton also advised avoiding too many "all-nighters," especially in a row. He said students may be doing themselves more of a service to go to bed instead of staying up late and studying.

He also emphasized the importance of maintaining a well-balanced diet.

"A lot of students are really not aware of how a diet can affect the way they perform," he said.

Vise courtesy of Waters True-Value Hardware

Students need to eat enough protein at breakfast for the day and should try to stay away from concentrated levels of sugar, salt and alcohol. He said these foods and liquids generally will not enhance students' performances.

"If they have to snack, it's OK," he said. "But if they snack mid-morning and mid-afternoon, maybe preparing some little plastic bags of dried fruit or sunflower seeds would not hurt them."

He said by maintaining a balanced diet, students will keep energy levels up and perform better in the classroom.

Finally, Egerton said exercise and mental breaks can help.

"It doesn't have to be hard running," he said, "but walking, even if it is just around the campus will help."

When students exercise, he said, they can take the opportunity to "give the mind a break."

He said when students are walking, even between classes, they should forget their worries and enjoy life.

Besides these suggestions, he said several "quicky stress strategies" can be used 20-50 times a day to combat the 50-200 small-stress situations students may face in a normal day.

These strategies include taking a deep, slow breath from the abdomen and relaxing the shoulders.

Reverence for athletics is diminishing

Sports unfairly crucified by non-athletes

Being an athlete is no longer a respectable or dignified vocation. Time and again, that is the message that has appeared on this page and elsewhere throughout this paper. Athletics have been cited as a cause of many of the financial problems at this University, and the athletes themselves have been repeatedly portrayed as game-playing imbeciles who leech University resources away from education and the "true" students.

And while a lot of people have been taking cheap shots at athletics, there is one group that has kept fairly quiet this whole time: the athletes. The STUDENT-athletes. I would like to correct that. I am a K-State track and cross country athlete who will graduate this year and attend law school in the fall. Over the past few years, I have seen the trend against athletics steadily gain momentum,

The main complaint I keep hearing from the academic purists is that the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is robbing the rest of the University of money that should be going for educational improvements. Superficially, that seems to be the case. But the truth is the athletic department gives back a lot more to K-State over the long haul than it takes. In fact, the majority of the money the department uses is money it generates itself.

But more importantly, a strong athletic department is one of the most powerful marketing tools a public university like K-State can have. When we turn to the local news, a portion of it every evening is dedicated to sports. We don't find film footage of students taking a Calculus III test, and live television coverage has never been given to a physics demonstration. I'm not being facetious.

I am merely trying to point out that one of the biggest contacts the general public (and specifically, those high school seniors shopping around for a college) will have with a state university will be with its athletic department. That is the same general public, I might add, that supports K-State with its taxes and whose feelings about the institution are reflected in the Board of Regents.

RODNEY MURROW

I'm not suggesting that anyone is shallow enough to pick a college-based on the performance of its basketball and football teams, but it will have some effect on their perception of the institution as a whole. You only have to look as far as the University of Kansas to see what a Final Four appearance in the NCAA basketball tournament (and the corresponding national TV coverage that comes with it) can do for enrollment and the region's perception of the quality of the institution.

Obviously, basketball isn't the only reason KU's enrollment is rising (and along with it, its status), but you can bet that it is one of them. And with increasing enrollment comes an increase in the amount of tuition money coming into the school, and that benefits all of us.

It's not that K-State's academic programs can't stand on their own merit; they definitely can. But with the competition for incoming students the way it is, we have to first get students to look at K-State. It is only then that they can find out about all the Truman and Rhodes scholars this school produces and all the opportunities it offers.

One of the things I have found the most fascinating in the anti-athletic discussions is the idea that IF you are an athlete THEN you're stupid, or at the very least not a "real" student. It's an interesting piece of logic that has the two being mutually exclusive. In fact, 18th-century French philosopher Jean Jacques Rousseau once wrote, "It is a lamentable mistake to imagine that bodily activity hinders the working of the mind as if the two kinds of activity might not advance hand-in-hand and as if the one were not intended to act as a guide to the other."

I'll be the first to admit there are plenty of athletes who are lousy students; there are also plenty of non-athletes who are lousy students. To make the assumption that because someone is a successful athlete they are also a poor student is not only logically inconsistent, it is downright irresponsible, just as the case is with most stereotypes.

Most of what I've written up until now has all been said before. But what isn't mentioned much is what athletics has to offer that justifies its presence at a university, aside from the aforementioned marketing aspect. If we learn English in the English department and chemistry in the chemistry department, what can be learned in the athletic department aside from the techniques used in activities that most of us already know how to perform to some degree? Character. That's right. Character.

It's not something that gets brought up much anymore in association with athletics (drugs and laughable SAT scores have replaced it), but that is still what is at the heart of most sports. All of those worn-out clichés about dedication, perseverance and overcoming odds are still true, however corny they may sound at times. There is also a lot of truth in the old saying about sports imitating life.

You find out a lot about yourself in the emotionally and physically draining daily grind of training and in the heat of intense competition. Some of what you find out isn't too easy to face, but only after you face it can you deal with it. The truth is, there is a lot to be said for plain old toughness, and few things teach that better than athletics.

I have been both a serious student and a serious athlete, and I think I can honestly say that I have learned as much, if not more, that will help me later in life from my involvement in athletics as I have in school. The sole purpose of a university like K-State is to teach, and not everything can be taught out of books.

Granted, not all students possess both the desire and innate physical abilities to be athletes, but that can be said for any program of study on this campus. And everyone can still get something from coming to the games and watching the struggle take place, even if it is only a good dose of enthusiasm or inspiration.

And THAT'S more than any other department on campus can say.

Rodney Murrow is a senior in physical sciences.

Memorial's formation necessary for K-State

Plans are underway to construct a new memorial to the K-State students who lost their lives in the Vietnam War. Even though a memorial plaque is on display in the Union, a larger, more visible tribute is in order for the 31 K-State students who fell victim to that controversial conflict.

The memorial committee, which is working on the project, was formed in 1986 by Gary Haulmark, sophomore in political science. The committee headed by Gov. Mike Hayden has planned the dedication for Nov. 11 — Veterans Day.

Since the Vietnam War is still on the minds of many people and remains a subject of political debate, the dedication of the memorial seems appropriate primarily because it will shift the discussion from a political emphasis to a humanitarian one. For too long, this country has thought only of the prestige it lost and not the individuals.

The memorial will not only recognize those students who died in connection with the war, but it will stand as a constant reminder of the seriousness and caution needed in our country's foreign policies.

The proposed site, the campus quadrangle north of Nichols Hall and west of McCain Auditorium, is fitting due to the visibility offered by the location.

Once the Vietnam memorial is in place, K-State will have a more suitable reminder of its 31 students who gave their lives while serving our country.

New fee to jeopardize University enrollment

The K-State administration has found a way to counteract the recruitment efforts it has so diligently been promoting. At a time when K-State's enrollment has taken a turn for the worse and the all-out effort to increase enrollment is in full swing, this recent decision by the administration does not make sense.

Instead of encouraging students to come to K-State, the administration has decided to discourage prospective students by charging them a fee. This $10 fee is being charged to all freshman and transfer students when they attend the summer orientation program, and if a new student wishes to bring a parent along, each parent must pay $8 as well.

Prospective students are receiving a brochure from the University telling them all about this wonderful expanded orientation program. The program is to be a full-day event and the students will receive all the necessary enrollment materials free. Big deal — tell the students something that matters.

The administration claims the old orientation did not develop a bond between the new student and the University. Do they think that by expanding the program and adding a fee a bond is going to be formed?

With an increase in tuition inevitable, tacking on another cost will do more harm than good. Students are already having a hard enough time making ends meet; they don't need to have another worry hanging over their heads.

This new program is going to discourage early enrollment as well as those students who haven't decided to enroll until August. Some prospective students are not able to attend the orientation programs in June or July for a number of reasons.

Some students have full-time jobs that prevent them from attending the orientation sessions, while some students may visit the campus in April and May and in the past have been able to talk with an adviser and enroll earlier. If these prospective students are not given the option of early or later enrollment they will go somewhere else.

This does not seem to support K-State's efforts to increase enrollment.

Observation vital in our world

Ah, the last column.

What can be said when there is still so much left to say, yet there is no more space to say it? Lord knows I've rambled endlessly this semester on such topics as abortion, human rights violations, the spiritual 1960s, freedom of speech, Israeli oppression, the slow death of education at K-State, civil rights and international awareness. And still my mind clicks away on how to address further these topics and more.

I've come to understand several aspects of journalism since I have been a columnist. Though this newspaper is ONLY the Collegian, its columnist positions should be taken very seriously. To be able to write once a week — and maybe more if I had asked for more — on any topic whatsoever is a very big responsibility for a columnist. It is the only position on the newspaper with that kind of freedom.

There are so many important events occurring in the world that need to be discussed openly and generously. These events are happening in your own back yard as well as 10,000 miles around the world. If a columnist does not attempt to investigate and report on the issues of the day — at least once in a while — then I say that is a huge waste of space, time, money and paper.

Perhaps I am being a bit too serious, but there is an infinite list of injustices, abuses and tragedies of which the American people need to be informed. The American media do quite well at keeping the people informed of the basics in life. However, if American citizens only knew half of the unjust and scandalous liberties taken with their money, their resources and their rights and freedoms everyone would faint from shock. It is the free press's duty — as the watchdog of government — to expose America's wrongdoings for all its citizenry to see.

A newspaper columnist should never be used to fight personal battles or to keep a vendetta going. It should never be used as a psychotherapeutic couch onto which the columnist spills his or her guts for all the world to see. Unfortunately, these types of column abuse do occur nationally as well as locally.

There is no doubt the editorial pages of American newspapers can use some "fluff" opinions once in a while, but they technically do not belong there. Fluff opinions are those opinions comprised primarily of regurgitations of life's daily hassles: "Gee, my brand new car wouldn't start today; shucks, exam week sure is a drag." Newspapers run plenty of human interest columns and feature stories. These are best kept in the "lifestyles" section of the paper and not on the opinion-editorial pages of a newspaper.

PATTI PAXSON

People read the opinion pages for information and points of view on the important issues, especially those concerning government. A columnist has the power to sway a bit of the public opinion if done in just the right way. For just this reason alone, the position has the potential to be dangerous.

And believe me, people take columnists' opinions very seriously. The responses to my columns have been incredible. People stop me on the streets to voice their opinion; they call, they write and they send me information they feel refutes my opinion. Sometimes the mail is anonymous, but most of the time people want you to know who they are and exactly what they have on their mind. People take columns very seriously!

Why the great amount of attention to my columns amaze me is found in the question, "Who the heck am I?" I am simply your basic rookie columnist with high aspirations of being a professional columnist one day. Does my opinion really matter in the whole scheme of things? Probably not, but the reason a columnist gets responses from the public is because the public knows what kind of power a columnist — and the press in general — has over public opinion. Whether or not my opinion has any validity in anyone's life is secondary. The primary concern of people is that I don't abuse that columnist power.

If there is anything I have learned as an "opinionated muckraker," it has been this lesson of the power of the press. I am not claiming that I have swayed all public opinion within a 100-mile radius. I haven't. I have, though, made some people think. This is very important to me. For if I have contributed to the greater understanding of an important issue in the mind of at least one person, then I feel I have succeeded this semester.

None of my opinions are right or wrong, though some who wrote letters to the editor seemed to think so. I am, however, very grateful for all the comments about my columns — favorable and unfavorable. It has been the responses to my columns that have taught me what to write and what not to write, what is ethical and what is not, and when I've abused my position and when I have not.

I am also grateful to all those who took the time to read my columns. It is a wonderful feeling for a writer to have his or her work read — whether or not it's liked seems to be secondary most of the time. Writing has become my life and for the Collegian to have given me the freedom to express my views has been nothing but pure pleasure. The pay stinks, but I would do it for nothing. So, my appreciation goes to that great vehicle of opinion and news — our very own Collegian.

And so, the rookie columnist closes her last column here — soon to head east, master's degree in hand, with lots of hope for a fulfilling future as a newspaper writer. If there is anything from my columns that I would reiterate one more time, it is this: Keep love and truth always at the forefront of life, and never, ever let injustice slip by without doing battle with it.

I wish you all the best, but to my good friends I must give a special place in my heart. A very big "Shukran!" to the "international table" in the Union — your support has meant the world to me. Here's wishing you all success in your pursuit of knowledge, peace and love.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR pertaining to matters of public interest are encouraged. All letters must be typewritten or neatly printed and signed by the author and should not exceed 300 words. The author's major, classification or other identification and phone number must be included. The Collegian reserves the right to edit letters for style and spatial considerations.

Letters may be brought to Kedzie 116 or mailed to the Collegian Editorial Page Editor, Kedzie 103, Kansas State University, Manhattan, Kan. 66506.

Community thanks

Editor,

The Flint Hills Breadbasket board of directors, staff and general membership would like to convey through your newspaper our sincere thanks to all sectors of the K-State community for its support during the 1986-87 school year.

So many individuals and groups donated food, contributed funds and volunteered services toward the task of minimizing hunger in this community. The Breadbasket was able to reach many more local families in need of food assistance because of your participation. Thank you for your involvement.

In addition to our appreciation, we want to wish all your readers success and happiness this summer and beyond. Our best wishes to those who are leaving for new opportunities. And for those returning, have a great summer, then hurry back in the fall.

Dangerous apathy

Editor,

I saw a bumper sticker yesterday that has caused me some distress. It read: "I don't know, I don't care and it doesn't make any difference." My initial reaction was laughter, but buried beneath that superficial response were feelings of anger and hopelessness.

In a free country, a country governed by the people and for the people, apathy can be a very dangerous attitude. Aren't we intelligent enough to learn from our mistakes? After the depression in the '30s, World War II in the '40s and the Korean conflict in the '50s, our parents' generation, understandably, wanted to be left in peace to raise their families and develop their careers.

They elected their representatives, the required government officials, and promptly forgot them. They had been brought up to do as they were told and not ask a lot of questions. Times were prosperous so things must be going well, right? Wrong! There was so much corruption in the government that we are still attempting to purge ourselves from the stigma of graft and illegal activities that ran rampant because "no one knew" and "no one cared."

During the '60s, the so-called baby boom generation had come of age. Having been raised in a much more permissive environment, they (for the first time in a long time) demanded explanations from their government and refused to blindly follow irrational leaders. They cared enough to "want to know" and it did make a difference.

Today we have an attitude that our government is laughable at best and more than likely criminal as well. The baby boomers are following their parents' footsteps and are busy raising families and developing careers. Where are the activists? Where are the watchdogs? What will it take to make people understand that to make a difference you must care enough to know?

Final week tension

Editor,

Monday, May 4, 8:30 a.m., it's here. The week of running scared. You can feel the tension in the air. All the telltale signs of finals week are there — baseball hats, caffeine IVs and what happened to all the cute girls in the cafeteria? I'll tell you what happened to them, they are all cramming frantically and care less about boys at this time than any other single period known to man. Yes, it truly is a wretched condition for our otherwise carefree college curriculum.

Coping is the name of the game here. Assuming that a full load of legitimate courses is in effect, then no doubt the first anxious stomach churns have already occurred. By next Wednesday there is bound to be some seriously overworked rationalizers out there. And I think it's in for a long week.

Of course, there are those who will sit back and chortle contentedly to themselves as they read this. For those who think finals are the last call at Auntie Mae's: One, I don't want to hear about how easy you have it; two, I hope you get a low paying job; and three, keep your pets indoors and an eye on traffic as you stroll along your shameful, unburied bliss. Other than that, I'm happy for both of you.

Great injustice

Editor,

On Wednesday at 9:30 a.m. in the parking lot near McCain Auditorium, one of the greatest injustices of my life occurred. I had been waiting for my usual parking space for about an hour. The gentleman came out, I waved, turned on my engine, signaled and started to turn.

Out of nowhere came a little blue car and blocked access to the spot. Speaking to her through the open window, I explained I had been waiting for an hour and that I didn't think it was fair of her to block the spot I had already signaled for. She chose to rudely ignore me and take the spot without a second thought.

At that moment, I noticed the faculty/staff permit hanging from her rearview mirror. I have always had a great deal of respect for educators and here was one who had just shattered my image. I believe educators have a great responsibility because, like it or not, they are a major role model for our youth.

I have had a lifelong dream of being an educator and I would hate it if I ever performed such an injustice to one of my fellow men, especially to a student, as she did to me. Hopefully, she will recognize her responsibility and clean up her act.

So, wherever you are, think about it.

Stop cheating

Editor,

It's sad to say, but I bet most of us have seen some form of cheating at K-State. There is a problem with academic honesty here and yet apparently only a few cheaters are caught and punished. I've also talked with a department head who didn't fully understand the University's policies on academic honesty. This disturbs me and I'm glad to see that the Student Senate is beginning to discuss the matter.

I attended a Student Senate committee meeting Friday in which the problem of academic honesty was discussed. The Student Senate is moving in the right direction. I wish that the Faculty Senate would only do the same and form a committee to examine academic honesty at K-State. I think that the Faculty Senate should work with the Student Senate in ensuring that everyone, from freshmen to department heads, knows and understands the policies the University has regarding academic honesty.

The integrity of a university depends greatly on its attitudes toward academics. We've become lax toward academic honesty and this will reflect on us on a national level, more than if there is enough parking on campus. I hope that the Faculty Senate will soon realize this and work with the Student Senate in educating this University on academic honesty.

Crew's success

Editor,

As a graduating senior and captain of the K-State Crew Team, I would like to reflect on the past four years of rowing at this fine institution. Although 1988 will mark the 25th anniversary of rowing at K-State, there were years in the late '70s and early '80s when K-State rowing was struggling to survive.

Four years ago, Don Rose returned to Manhattan, assuming the head coaching position and making crew his pet project with the goal of returning the K-State crew to the national prominence it once enjoyed. Four short years has seen the crew grow from a small, relatively unimpressive team to one that boasts 90 rowers and, despite its limitations, is able to compete at a high level with rowing's national powers.

Concerning funding for K-State sports, a constant problem, the crew team is one sport completely funded by its members, receiving no funding from the college. Our members understand and respect the funding problem, yet if the crew had been included, even minimally, in the recently defeated sports fee referendum, I believe the supporters of the crew at K-State would have been the difference that could have overwhelmingly passed the sports fee.

Although the crew supports the other outstanding sports programs at K-State, we felt that the fee's omission of the crew team was inexcusable. Our realization is that K-State cannot at this time allocate to crew anything equaling the $30,000 plus that Wichita State University and University of Kansas crew teams receive, yet even a token funding would be appreciated.

In conclusion, I would like to personally thank the Collegian staff for its fine reporting of, and support for, the crew's exceptional season. My association with the crew's outstanding and dedicated individuals has been a most rewarding situation. Best luck for the 25th anniversary season.

Eat 'em up, KSU!

Heartfelt thanks

Editor,

We, the family of Stephen Lobmeyer, would like to express our heartfelt gratitude to all the students and faculty members who cared enough to send flowers, cards and letters expressing their sympathy in the loss of our dear son and brother. We especially appreciate those who made the extra effort to attend his funeral.

As graduates of K-State ourselves, it means a lot to us that so many of you care so much.

Cowardly response

Editor,

In a speech given at the April 25 Mobilization for Peace and Justice in Central America and South Africa, Ed Asner commented that love for one's country does not mean blind obedience. The very makeup of our constitution empowers us with the ability, the right, to choose to question and, if necessary, to remove our leaders, ideally giving us the indirect power to control the fate of our country's actions.

Apparently, at least one person on this campus disagrees very strongly with this idea, and made this quite clear to three of us who attended the march. In fact, he stated that our opinions were part of a "communist game" — one that he has every intention of ending.

Our "admirer's" choice of a private forum to voice his discontent (i.e. rude phone calls, obscene letters left in the heat of the night, etc.) not only reflected his ignorance of obscenity laws, but also illustrates his disapproval — and perhaps fear — of expressing opposing ideas in a public forum, like a newspaper — or a peace march.

The accuser insinuated that while he loved America, the group that protested in Washington last weekend was disloyal and in the process of destroying this country.

It's really quite ironic that while he found our methods of protest dangerous and subversive, his method of communication was even more appropriate — to say the least. We fail to see how someone can claim to love America, while at the same time ignoring its fundamental principles: the freedom of expression, protection of unpopular ideas and sovereignty and legitimacy of the government resting in its people.

We feel a more appropriate medium for expressing disapproval of our political beliefs is direct confrontation through rational means. We invite our accuser to respond with a letter to the Collegian or The Manhattan Mercury, rather than continuing his emotional and cowardly scare tactics. After all, the reason that we're all at this University is not only to expose ourselves to and nurture new ideas, but also to learn how to express them in coherent, mature ways.

Drunken drivers

Editor,

I am concerned about an advertisement that ran in the Collegian from the men of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity regarding their friend "Paddy Murphy."

The comment, "It's OK, I drive better when I'm drunk," is of great concern to me. Alcohol-related accidents are the leading cause of death in the 16- to 24-year-old bracket. Why? Because people like this fictitious character "Paddy Murphy" thought they could drink, get drunk, and drive. Alcohol-related accidents are the leading cause of death in the United States today, outranking murder. Why? Because socially we accept drinking and driving.

I fail to see what is so attractive about drinking, driving and dying.

I feel that advertisements such as "Paddy Murphy" only entice young people into drinking and driving, and instead of helping to combat the problem of DUIs, it only compounds the problem. Hopefully, "Paddy Murphy" made it home safely, but 23,500 people last year did not.

Legislators end session in late-night debate

New speed limit a signature away

Republicans show unity in lovefest

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — In the waning hours of the 1987 session, the Kansas Legislature passed and sent bills to the governor Monday raising the speed limit to 65 mph on rural interstate highways and granting greater exemptions from the state's mineral severance tax.

The speed limit measure would affect motorists driving on 680 miles of rural Kansas interstates. Speeding tickets for motorists driving up to 70 mph would not be considered moving violations or held against a driver for insurance purposes.

The bill advanced to Gov. Mike Hayden from the House after lawmakers approved a compromise version of a final, catch-all spending bill and gave first round approval to the severance tax measure.

If Hayden quickly signs the speed limit legislation into law as expected, the higher speeds will go into effect Thursday, upon publication in the Kansas Register.

Without action on the bill, the governor would have been forced to issue an executive order, which requires a 60 day delay before it can be implemented. The House approved the compromise on a vote of 107-18.

The agreement on the 65 mph speed limit issue surprised many who had thought the bill was lost. Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton, chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said the agreement was reached without a formal meeting of House and Senate negotiators.

Stripped from the final version of the speed limit bill was a House-passed provision calling for county names to be printed on every new license plate and language that would have allowed widows of prisoners of war to retain their special POW license plates.

However, negotiators agreed to keep a House amendment that allows motorists to be cited for speeds up to 70 mph on the rural interstates without it being counted as a moving violation.

The bill does not change a provision in current state law that allows motorists to be cited for speeds up to 10 mph over the 55 mph speed limit before tickets count for insurance purposes.

House lawmakers also passed, 82-34, the bill aimed at providing relief for the state's depressed oil industry by exempting more low-production wells from the 8 percent mineral severance tax.

The bill, which advanced to the governor after the Senate voted to concur in the House changes, would cost the state between $6 million and $6.5 million during the fiscal year that begins July 1, 1988.

During about 90 minutes of debate, a number of legislators — mostly Democrats — complained that the bill was more symbolic than substantive because an amendment offered on the floor would delay its effective date until May 1, 1988.

"There should be something in the symbol we're sending except an empty bucket," said House Minority Leader Marvin Barkis, D-Louisburg.

However, the chamber approved extending the effective date of the proposal on a 70-45 vote which generally followed party lines. The measure would be the first legislation enacted to make a major change the way extraction of minerals is taxed in the state since the severance tax was first enacted in 1983.

House Speaker Jim Braden threatened not to bring the bill to a final vote unless lawmakers approved delaying the effective date of the measure from July 15 to next May 1. Braden said the move was designed to save the state treasury about $5 million during the budget year that begins July 1.

The bill would raise exemptions to the tax for oil wells drilled more than 2,000 feet into the ground depending upon daily production and the price per barrel of oil.

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden joined hands with Republican legislative leaders Monday in a display of party unity during a post-session GOP lovefest at which all hailed the accomplishments of the 1987 Legislature.

Democrats were more somber in their assessments of the session, saying lawmakers "did as well as could be expected" but not an outstanding job.

"This session will undoubtedly go down in the history books as one of the most productive in recent history," Hayden said. "Some doubted the productivity of the session but I am extremely proud of the Legislature's accomplishments."

The biggest achievement, Hayden said, was the "restoration of fiscal integrity" in the state's bank account.

He noted that last July there was just $19 million in the general fund and $47 million is expected in the till at the end of the current fiscal year on June 30. Following Monday's action, experts project the general fund balances will reach $137.7 million in July 1988, presuming a $143 million windfall from federal tax reform.

It did not bother the governor that the Legislature worked five days past its constitutional limit of 90 days per session.

"Even though they took a couple extra days, nothing good ever comes easy and they faced some extremely difficult decisions," Hayden said. "They could have taken the easy way out and left the balances much lower. But they courageously said 'we're going to restore this state's financial condition' and I'm very pleased with their work."

Senate Minority Leader Michael Johnston, D-Parsons, called the 1987 session a "frustrating experience" for the minority party and listed several areas where the Legislature fell short.

"One of the major disappointments this session was that repeated attempts by Democrats to put more money into education failed, notwithstanding the half-hearted compromise reached on the omnibus bill," Johnston said of the $1.9 million additional state aid to public schools which broke a five-hour deadlock and cleared the way for adjournment.

"Funding for education received the smallest increase in 14 years. As a result, local property taxes will skyrocket in many areas of the state to make up for the deficit."

It also troubled Johnston that cities and counties were asked to shoulder much of the state's financial problems through reductions in transfers of sales tax funds.

"The state budget was cut at the expense of local units of government," Johnston said. "These cuts must be made at the local level, which will be keenly felt by taxpayers when their property tax statements come out in November."

Johnston said the $3.3 million allocated on a special state census would have been much better spent on elementary and secondary education. He also was unhappy the Legislature took so long to finally conclude its work.

Senate President Robert V. Talkington, R-Iola, shared his unhappy feelings about the overtime work of the Legislature and the failure to pass a death penalty bill or a highway construction program also disappointed the GOP leader. However, he preferred to emphasize the positive aspects of the session.

"We've taken a giant step toward restoring fiscal integrity to the general fund," Talkington said. "It was a good session."

Finalists chosen to succeed NCAA's director

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Four men have been chosen finalists to succeed Walter Byers as executive director of the NCAA, and will be identified at a news conference today, The Associated Press learned.

None of the four is a member of the NCAA staff, a source said.

People close to the search committee believe three of the "final four" could be John Ryan, president of Indiana University and former chairman of the powerful NCAA Presidents' Commission; Harvey Schiller, commissioner of the Southeastern Conference; and Richard "Dick" Schultz, athletic director at Virginia and chairman of the Division I men's basketball committee.

A search committee headed by NCAA President Will Bailey of Auburn University has been screening candidates for several months. Bailey will make the final list public on today and a decision is expected before the NCAA's special convention June 29-30 in Dallas.

Others frequently mentioned as possible final candidates include Jack Davis of Oregon State University, a former NCAA president, and Bill Cobey, a former North Carolina athletic director and former congressman who has strong ties to the influential American Council on Education.

"They're being about as secretive on this as they've ever been on anything," a source said. "Nobody knows for certain what's going on. Everybody wishes they did."

Byers was 29 when he was put in charge of a two-person staff operating out of the Big Ten Conference offices in Chicago in 1951. A short time later, he moved the NCAA to Kansas City, Mo., his hometown, and in 36 eventful years has built the most powerful — and controversial — amateur sports organization in the world.

Occupying its own twin office buildings in suburban Mission, Kan., the NCAA employs about 130 people and has an annual budget in excess of $200 million.

Byers is expected to work with his successor for about a year before retiring to his ranch in central Kansas to write his memoirs.

The final candidates will face a laborious interview process that will include four separate groups. The seven NCAA department heads will conduct interviews, along with representatives of the Presidents' Commission, the NCAA Council and the Executive Committee.

The final decision rests with the council. But the 44-member Presidents' Commission pushed through a rule at the NCAA Convention in January giving it veto power over the council's choice. This would seem to strengthen the position of Ryan, who as the commission's first chairman when it was formed in 1983 and became a quiet behind-the-scenes leader in the move for greater presidential involvement in athletics. Ryan was also the unanimous choice in a straw vote of the influential Big-Ten and Pac-10 presidents.

"It's no secret that the commission wants a president sitting in Byers' chair," said one source. "But that does not mean it will necessarily get what it wants."

A source also said the seven senior staff members were told no one would be hired over their objections.

The new executive director is expected to be offered a four- or five-year contract.

Byers' successor will have limited powers, especially at the outset of his administration, because power in college athletics is diffused. Most rules and broad policy positions are set by majority vote of the schools at their annual conventions.

"He couldn't have as much power as Walter because he won't have spent 36 years building up the bureaucratic system that Walter has built," said Chuck Neinas, executive director of the College Football Association and a former high-ranking NCAA staff member.

NBA teams continuing '87 playoffs

By The Associated Press

The Boston Celtics, winners of 31 consecutive games at Boston Garden, could have that homecourt advantage tested severely if Kevin McHale's injured ankle keeps him out of their NBA playoff series against Milwaukee.

McHale, a 6-foot-11 All-Star forward who has a stress fracture in his right ankle, is listed as questionable for Tuesday night's best-of-seven series opener against the Bucks.

"If he doesn't start, he probably won't play," Celtics Coach K.C. Jones said. "It wouldn't do any good to bring him off the bench. He'd be cold that way. If he can play, he'll start."

"It's been better and it's been worse," said McHale, who averaged 26.1 points during the regular season.

The Celtics haven't played since last Tuesday night, when they completed a three-game sweep of the Chicago Bulls.

Other games Tuesday have Detroit at Atlanta, Seattle at Houston and Golden State at the Los Angeles Lakers.

Milwaukee eliminated Philadelphia for the second straight season and ended Julius Erving's basketball career with a 102-89 victory over the 76ers Sunday.

Jones said he expects to see from Milwaukee "the same things they've been doing against Philadelphia — penetrating, pushing the ball hard, playing tough defense. They're smaller, quicker, with three guards, and they have (Terry) Cummings and the center."

Milwaukee Coach Don Nelson frequently uses three guards at the same time because Sidney Moncrief and Paul Pressey both have the ability to play defense against forwards.

Golden State became the second team in NBA history to rally from a 2-0 deficit to win a best-of-five series, defeating the Utah Jazz 118-113 Sunday.

The Lakers haven't played since last Wednesday night, after completing a three-game sweep over the Denver Nuggets.

Assistant track coach Scott Bennett instructs K-State jumpers and throwers and finds his greatest joy in coaching is simply watching an athlete improve. "I often feel as much a part of (the athlete's) success as they do."

Bennett abandons football, business to coach in track

By RICHARD BROADFOOT
Collegian Reporter

Assistant track coach Scott Bennett never intended to coach track.

"I originally went to the University of Wisconsin to play football," Bennett said, "and my goal was to become a football coach."

After becoming disillusioned with football, however, Bennett turned his interests toward another love — track and field.

Bennett's coaching odyssey began at Madison (Wis.) Memorial High School in 1975. He worked part time as a track coach and part time in the sporting goods business until 1977, when he decided to devote full time to sporting goods.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

"After a while I was vice president of a 10-store chain and making pretty good money," Bennett said, "but I really missed the coaching."

So in 1982, Bennett returned to coaching as a graduate assistant at the University of Wisconsin. He spent the next three years coaching at both Wisconsin and the University of Wisconsin-LaCrosse, until the spring of 1986 when he arrived at K-State.

Bennett, now in his second season at K-State, spends much of his time instructing Wildcat jumpers and throwers. He also uses one technique that casual track fans may not be aware of — slow-motion videotape.

"I find it invaluable," Bennett said of videotaping. "It allows the coach and the athlete to review the performance right there on the field."

Bennett said many skills used in field events happen too quickly for the human eye to follow. By reviewing the tape in slow motion, each of these skills can be picked out and analyzed.

"Even the coach can only see one or two things at regular speed."

Bennett said his greatest joy in coaching is simply watching an athlete improve.

"I often feel as much a part of (the athlete's) success as they do," Bennett said. "Of course, I also feel as much a part of their failures."

Bennett said his greatest thrill as a coach came at last year's NCAA indoor championships.

"Kenny Harrison was leading the long jump competition going into the final round, when one of the competitors jumped four inches farther than Kenny ever had," Bennett said.

Harrison then went on to capture the NCAA title on the final jump of the competition.

Bennett, a native of Brookfield, Wis., graduated with a master's degree in physical education from Wisconsin-Madison in 1976. He received his master's degree in human performance from Wisconsin-LaCrosse in 1984.

Dealing primarily with jumps in his track coaching career, Bennett has coached seven All-Americans, seven NAIA national qualifiers, 10 Big Ten Conference champions and one national championship cross country team.

Of the future, Bennett lists head coaching as a possibility.

"I'd like to be a head coach, but those situations seem to just happen to you," he said. "I don't think you can make them happen."

For now, Bennett said he is happy at K-State.

"I really enjoy going to work every day," he said. "Having gone through the process of working outside of coaching, I know this is what I want to do."

A tale of two major-leaguers

St. Louis' Todd Worrell says work will cure pitching woes

By The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — According to relief star Todd Worrell of the St. Louis Cardinals, there's little wrong with his pitching that more work won't probably cure.

Manager Whitey Herzog hopes Worrell's right. To date, the Worrell of 1987 bears faint resemblance to the overpowering pitcher who was the National League's Rookie of the Year last summer.

"I don't want to shake his confidence, because if he (doesn't) do it, we ain't going to do anything anyway," Herzog said of Worrell, who has a 9.95 earned-run average and a 0-1 record for St. Louis, the NL East leader.

"He's healthy, and he's throwing good; he's just getting the ball in bad spots," Herzog said. "Sometimes (when) you go through a situation (where) you try too (darned) hard. Everything you throw is wrong."

A case in point was Worrell's tribulation Saturday night while pitching before a packed house at Busch Stadium.

After he was summoned to protect Bob Forsch's 5-2 lead in the eighth inning against the Los Angeles Dodgers, the 6-foot-5 pitcher faced four batters. The first doubled, and two of the next three homered. It was Worrell's career-worst outing in 99 major league appearances.

"I think sometimes you can think yourself out of pitching well," the Cards' right-hander said in reflecting on his problems.

"It's not that I'm not throwing the ball and I can't get it over the plate but that I'm actually throwing it almost too good — I mean (over) the center portion of the plate."

Mike Roarke, the St. Louis pitching coach, agrees.

"Actually, he's throwing the ball well; he's had poor location," Roarke said. "He's thrown too many hittable pitches. That kinda goes in streaks."

Roarke, who a few seasons ago steered former Cards reliever Bruce Sutter through trouble, said Worrell's woes began April 18.

"I think one game he was wild; that was the only game he was wild in," Roarke said of the pitcher's five-walk performance that night against the New York Mets. "Sometimes when that happens, the tendency is to try to make sure you throw strikes."

Worrell, who a year ago at this point had worked in 10 games spanning 18 2-3 innings compared to this season's eight games and 6 1-3 innings, hopes more trips to the mound will restore the form that in 1986 earned him an NL-leading 36 saves.

"I think you need to keep going out there and keep going at 'em and keep staying aggressive," Worrell said.

Cincinnati's Eric Davis excels overall, exceeds expectations

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — A great baseball player can hit, hit with power, field, throw and run. A month into the 1987 season, Eric Davis is a great player.

"You can't anticipate anything like this," Davis said after hitting three home runs, including a grand slam, as the Cincinnati Reds beat Philadelphia 9-6 Sunday.

Davis leads the major leagues with a .411 batting average, 12 home runs, 27 runs scored, a .900 slugging percentage, and his 27 runs batted in ties him with Baltimore's Cal Ripken Jr. for the best in baseball. Davis also has stolen 10 bases and keeps earning praise for his play in center field.

"He can be as good as he wants to be," Reds Manager Pete Rose said, "and make as much as money as he wants."

Rose was one of many in the Cincinnati system who projected several years ago that Davis could become the game's next dominant force.

Davis, 24, broke into the majors late in the 1984 season with the Reds and began the 1985 season with Cincinnati but was sent back to the minors after a slow start. He started to show what he could do last year, batting .277 with 27 homers, 71 RBI and 80 stolen bases.

"I just try to go out and do my job," Davis said. "I'm young and still learning."

He apparently learns very quickly. Two weekends ago in Houston, Davis tied a major-league record by striking out nine straight times.

But this past weekend in Philadelphia, he destroyed the Phillies. Davis went 9-for-13 with five homers, including two grand slams, 11 RBI and seven runs scored in three games.

He went 4-for-5 Sunday, starting off by singling, stealing second and scoring in the second inning.

Davis hit a solo home run to right field in the third off Kevin Gross, hit a grand slam to left in the fourth against Dan Schatzeder and a homer to center off Schatzeder in the sixth.

"It was my day today. I saw the ball real good, and got good pitches to hit," Davis said. "I didn't especially try to hit homers. I just let things happen."

Phillies Manager John Felske said: "That's about a good a series as you'll ever see a player have. We tried to get the ball in on him, but he's just hot, and we couldn't do anything with him."

"He can run down every ball in center field. He hits with power. He can steal a base anytime he wants and he throws well. I don't see anything lacking," Felske said.

Men's soccer team slips by Kansas

A goal from Harold Rathburn late in the match enabled the K-State men's soccer team to escape Saturday with a 1-0 victory over the University of Kansas in Lawrence.

Rathburn received a pass deep in Kansas territory from Hans-Jorn Paulsen and headed in the winning goal with five minutes left in the game.

K-State finished the spring season with an overall record of 4-5-1, and a fourth-place finish in the Big Eight Conference.

State duck hunting cost to increase

There have been murmurs among sportsmen that duck hunting in Kansas is becoming a rich man's sport. It's a tough murmur to argue with.

Next fall the tab for waterfowling in this state, for state residents, will push 30 bucks and that's not counting the cost of expensive steel-shot shells, which will be required nearly everywhere worth going to for the trouble.

At least $3 of that tab will go toward the new duck stamp signed into law by Gov. Mike Hayden this month required for waterfowlers along with their hunting licenses and the federal stamp.

Rain cancels Royals, Toronto game

Monday night's game between the Toronto Blue Jays and Kansas City Royals was rained out and rescheduled as part of a two-night double-header on Friday, July 3.

'Dr. J' ends 16-year pro career

MILWAUKEE — Julius Erving had no tears to shed when he headed off the court for a final time amid the hugs and cheers.

The Doctor was retiring. He had made his final house call, and it was a time to savor and not sorrow.

With the same grace and style he had displayed in 16 years as a professional basketball player — both on and off the court — Erving seized the emotional situation and put it into its proper place.

"It's not that men can't cry, but this was not a tear-jerker situation," he said Sunday after his Philadelphia 76ers were eliminated by the Milwaukee Bucks in the NBA playoffs.

Hiring of department head cancels instructor's position

By PAT HUND
Campus Editor

The decision to not rehire a popular temporary instructor of mechanical engineering has brought strong reactions from students wishing to continue studying under him.

Jon Held, a temporary instructor of mechanical engineering, was not rehired for next year because of budget shortfalls within the department, said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering.

In response, more than 150 students in the department signed and submitted a petition to Rathbone asking to reinstate Held, who has been teaching in the department since 1978.

"We became concerned when we found out Jon wasn't going to be able to be rehired," said John Ellenz, junior in mechanical engineering. "All the students who know him, like him," said Amy Noeth, junior in mechanical engineering. "He's always helping students with their problems."

Rathbone said the decision to not rehire Held stems from the creation of another position within the department.

The new position has been created to accommodate Paul Miller Jr., current head of the Department of Mechanical Engineering, who will step down in June but will remain a faculty member.

The move will mean that surplus funds will be needed to pay the incoming department head — funds that are not available in the department's general fund.

"It costs a lot of money to hire a new department head," Rathbone said.

Because Held is a temporary instructor, the department was able to eliminate his position — a move that has been unpopular with students in the department.

Miller said he notified Held in March that he would not be rehired next year.

"Jon Held has done an excellent job for us, but we can't just make dollar bills," Rathbone said.

Students agree with Rathbone's praise of Held's teaching, and some say his removal involves department priorities.

John Socolofsky, junior in mechanical engineering, said it is unfair to the undergraduate students that Held's position is being eliminated.

"Sometimes undergraduate students are pushed aside," he said. "The research in mechanical engineering seems to be more important."

Rathbone disagrees.

"This college is so undergraduate-oriented," Rathbone said, in comparison with other engineering colleges in the nation. "We're trying to maintain our undergraduate program and place more emphasis on the graduate program."

However, Held does not agree with Rathbone's assessment of the undergraduate program and also contends a question of priorities is involved.

"I think there is some problem with the priorities (of the college)," he said. "Education is not the biggest concern; at the university, education (should be) the No. 1 priority."

Budget cuts by the state Legislature because of enrollment decreases at K-State magnify the budgetary shortcomings in the department, which means even less money will be given to the mechanical engineering department, Rathbone said.

Held said he believes the Legislature is unconcerned with funding higher education.

"The Legislature does not have education as one of their higher concerns," he said.

For Held, who is still working to complete his doctorate in mechanical engineering, the likelihood increases that he may leave the department even though he could accept a job as a graduate teaching assistant — a position that pays half of his current $18,000 salary.

"Teaching is what I enjoy, but I have an offer to go to Topeka for $46,000 (annually)," he said.

Rathbone said he does not want Held to leave and will examine the preliminary budget for next year as set by the Legislature this week.

'Evil Dead 2' incredibly bloody; 'witty' sequel exercises bad taste

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Naming this film "Evil Dead 2" strikes me as a major error: The original "Evil Dead" never played in many major cities — such as Kansas City. So who's going to line up outside a theater to see the sequel to a movie they've never seen?

Film Review

The original "Evil Dead" is a scary (and often incredibly stupid) movie about a group of young adults who are attacked by a demonic creature that roams the woods outside a secluded cabin. The only people familiar with this film are the horror aficionados who've rented it on videotape.

"Evil Dead 2" isn't really a sequel; it's simply the same film remade on a larger budget. Many of the stylistic touches which director Sam Raimi brought to the first film are present in this remake.

Once again the camera glides through the woods, around tree trunks, through brush, over mounds of leaves, giving us the creature's point of view. It's as if the creature picked up a camera from his last victim and now he's hooked on the silly thing.

These tracking shots through the woods are absurd, but they're also powerful. They force us to see what the creature sees, so in a sense we become possessed, which is exactly what the creature intends to do to his victims. Once possessed, his victims become killing machines. The only way to stop them is to chop off their limbs. This makes for an incredibly bloody movie.

The story gets started when a man and woman stop at a cabin. Nobody's there so they make themselves at home. Unknown to them, though, the owner was an archaeologist who had discovered an ancient book of pagan rituals, "The Book of the Dead." When he translated the book and read it aloud, he brought forth from another dimension (in H.P. Lovecraft fashion) a creature that only knows evil and destruction. This creature quickly killed the archaeologist and his wife, and now it's on the loose.

The major difference between the original film and the remake is in the amount of comedy. The original film certainly wasn't serious, but it was rarely funny. "Evil Dead 2," though, is often hilarious.

In one scene, the hero, Ash (played by Bruce Campbell who also starred in "Evil Dead") must fight his own right hand. The evil spirits try to take possession of him, but his hand is all they can manage to control. (He's one tough dude.) His hand grabs everything it can reach — plates, lamps, hammers — and bashes him over the head. In these moments the movie nearly turns into slapstick comedy, but director Raimi gives these scenes a hypnotic, surrealistic quality.

At another time a woman, who had been decapitated, rises from her shallow grave and cavorts outside the cabin, playing with her own head as if it were a ball.

The other major change comes near the end. Ash gets mean with the monster, straps a chainsaw to one arm, grabs a shotgun and heads into battle.

Even with all the buckets of blood, "Evil Dead 2" is a fun movie. It's a witty exercise in bad taste that is bound to disturb those pious souls who see themselves as arbiters of public morals. Sure the film is perverse, but it's so loaded with surrealism (thanks to a hyperactive fog machine), and it's so absurdly filmed, that it's impossible to take it seriously.

Student publications' efforts result in national recognition

By DORI WITHERS
Collegian Reporter

The 1986 Royal Purple yearbook, the fall Collegian and individual photographers at Student Publications Inc. recently received national recognition.

The yearbook has been selected as one of the six national Pacemaker winners in the National Scholastic Press Association and Associated Collegiate Press competition at the University of Minnesota at Minneapolis-St. Paul.

"I was more excited last year when it came out than now because of the student response," said Ronda Corle, senior in journalism and mass communications and editor of the 1986 yearbook.

She said receiving the honor is "the icing on the cake." Her major objective — pleasing the student body — was more important.

The yearbook received the award in 1981 and 1984.

"I'm really pleased to see the tradition (receiving the award) continue," said Dave Adams, director of Student Publications Inc.

Adams said he is most pleased with the student body recognizing Student Publications because the student body is "the one judge who matters the most."

The Collegian for the fall semester received a five-star All-American Award based in five categories: Coverage and content; writing and editing; opinion content; design; and photography and arts and graphics.

The Collegian received marks of distinction in the five categories, which is criteria for receiving the five-star award.

Chris Stewart, senior in journalism and mass communications and fall Collegian editor, said he somewhat expected the award because of the exceptional work produced by the staff.

"I was not surprised at all because of the efforts of the staff," Stewart said.

"I gave each staff member the freedom and opportunity to shine," he said. "And I believe they really did."

Four K-State photographers were recognized at a national level in the 42nd Annual College Photographer of the Year contest.

Andy Nelson, senior in journalism and mass communications, received an Award of Excellence for his portfolio. The portfolio consisted of 17 individual photographs and one picture story. Of the 63 portfolios entered, Nelson placed fourth.

Last year he placed second overall, and in 1985 he placed third.

"It's been a long year, and I feel lucky to be recognized for my work," Nelson said. "It is quite an honor."

In addition to the portfolio award, Nelson placed second overall in the college life category and received an Award of Excellence in the feature, portrait and picture-story categories.

Other photographers who placed in individual categories were Stewart, third place overall in picture story; Brett Hacker, junior in journalism and mass communications, Award of Excellence in sports; Jeff Tuttle, senior in journalism and mass communications, Award of Excellence in college life.

Poll reveals bookstore pays best text buy-back prices

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State Union Bookstore pays more for used textbooks than the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Fort Hays State University.

These are the results after polling Steve Jewett, textbook coordinator of KU; Jack Gillette, textbook supervisor of WSU; and Steve Gonzales, bookstore manager of Fort Hays State campus bookstores. The bookstores were asked when professors have to turn in their book orders to the bookstore; when the bookstore turns in the book orders to the publishers; how much the bookstore marks up new books; how much they buy back used books for; and how much they sell used books for.

The four bookstores vary in the amount they pay for used books. Fort Hays State pays 50 percent of what the student bought the book for, whether the book was new or used when the student bought it, Gonzales said.

KU and WSU pay 50 percent of the current new book price, even if the book was bought used.

K-State pays 60 percent of the publisher's list price (new book price) for books that professors will use again, said Jerry Fields, book department manager of K-State Union Bookstore.

Professors in all four universities are supposed to turn in their book orders to the bookstore in April for the fall semester and in October for the spring semester. Each bookstore gives the professors specific deadlines each semester. These dates give the publishers' representatives time to introduce new textbooks to the professors and allows the bookstores time to contact vendors to buy as many used textbooks as possible.

The bookstores turn in their book orders to the publishers in June for the fall semester and in November for the spring semester. When teachers turn in book orders late, change their order, or if the books are not available, students have a delay in getting their books at the semester start.

All four bookstores mark up new books 20 percent to 25 percent of wholesale. The increase is to pay for overhead and freight expenses.

The four bookstores do not buy back books the professors will not use again. Vendors buy these books to sell to other schools which will continue to use the book. The prices paid to the students for these books are determined by the vendor in accordance with the amount of books he has in inventory and the demand he or she foresees for the book.

KU, WSU and K State, charge 75 percent of new book price for used books when selling them to the students. The mark up varies from book to book at Fort Hays State.

Documents reveal Nixon era

By The Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — As Richard M. Nixon's political advisers planned his 1972 re-election campaign, they feared that Gov. Ronald Reagan of California might seek to wrest the Republican presidential nomination away from Nixon, according to documents made public Monday.

The political memorandums were among 252,000 pages of Nixon administration documents made public by the National Archives. Their release came after a 13-year effort by Nixon and many of his former associates to keep them secret.

The material was only a fraction of a 1.5 million-page cache of sensitive White House documents from the Nixon era. The release of the remaining material is still under challenge. The bulk of what was released Monday was unrelated to the Watergate scandal which drove Nixon from the presidency.

One memo dealing with Watergate was written by John D. Ehrlichman three weeks after the June 17, 1972, break-in at Democratic National Committee headquarters in the Watergate office building. It described Nixon as concerned about the impression the White House was involved in a cover-up.

"Can't appear to cover up, not a whiff of it," wrote Ehrlichman, describing a conversation with the president on July 8, 1972.

However, that memo contradicted a tape recording of a conversation between Nixon and his aide, H.R. Haldeman, on June 23, 1972, just six days after the break-in. That recording became known as the "smoking gun" — the evidence that showed Nixon was involved in the effort to cover up the White House role in the break-in. On the tape, Nixon was heard discussing the use of the CIA to keep the FBI from delving too deeply into the break-in.

Period of secrecy ends

The possibility of a Reagan challenge was raised in memos, written in May and June of 1971, dealing with the choice of San Diego as the site for the 1972 Republican National Convention.

A memo to Haldeman, White House chief of staff, from aides Jeb Stuart Magruder and William E. Timmons cited the "possibility of a Reagan candidacy" as an argument against choosing San Diego.

The memo, dated June 26, 1971, also said that then-Republican Party chairman Bob Dole "should be notified so he can engineer his site selection committee to make identical recommendations to the president. Dole should then meet with the president to advise him of the committee's views, giving the president an opportunity to concur."

An earlier Timmons memo warned that if San Diego were chosen "we can expect a blood-letting confrontation between the Finch and Reagan forces for control or at least public exposure."

Robert Finch, a former Cabinet secretary, was then on the White House staff and was planning to return to California and run for office. A moderate Republican, Finch was considered a potential rival to Reagan for control of the California GOP.

In 1968, Reagan made a belated challenge to Nixon for the GOP presidential nomination.

After a two-day visit to San Diego early in May, Timmons advised Haldeman that his assessment would include "no evaluation given to California in relation to the possibility of Reagan or (Rep. Pete) McCloskey contesting the nomination."

With the White House calling the shots, the Republican National Committee selected San Diego, but the convention was moved to Miami Beach, Fla., after disclosure that ITT, owner of the Sheraton hotel chain, had pledged $400,000 in cash to help cover expenses of a San Diego convention.

Subsequent reports alleged that the pledge was a factor in favorable settlement of a government antitrust action against the conglomerate.

In Ehrlichman's hand-written memo dealing with Watergate, he described Nixon as wanting to "get out the enthusiastic nature of the investigation...do it fully, let chips fall — no coverup — no one in White House involved — our investigation completed...possible involvement of lower level officials."

The Ehrlichman notes also referred to "concern of what Hunt might do — immunity."

He referred to Watergate burglar E. Howard Hunt who later served 32 months in prison.

Ehrlichman, who was Nixon's chief domestic adviser, later was convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice and served 18 months in prison.

Along with the Ehrlichman material, the National Archives made public documents from the files of John Dean, the White House counsel who gave prosecutors their first information about the involvement of top officials in the scandal, Egil Krogh, Gordon Strachan and Harry Dent.

Krogh, Ehrlichman's assistant, pleaded guilty to a civil rights violation stemming from the break-in at the office of Lewis Fielding, a psychiatrist who had treated anti-war activist Daniel Ellsberg. Dent was sentenced to one month unsupervised probation after he pleaded guilty to a campaign contribution violation. An obstruction of justice charge against Strachan was dismissed.

On March 21, 1973, the day Dean met with Nixon, Haldeman and Ehrlichman and told them the Watergate cover-up was "a cancer on the presidency," Ehrlichman received a memo from an aide telling him that Mrs. William Rehnquist "was very upset that she and Justice Rehnquist had not been invited to the White House since his appointment to the Supreme Court. ...It would be to our advantage to see that Rehnquist receives an invitation to a state dinner in the not too distant future."

Networks to air scandal hearings

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least at the start, viewers and listeners at home should have no trouble keeping up with the Iran-Contra hearings that begin Tuesday.

Not since the 1973 hearings on the Watergate scandal have so many broadcast organizations trained their microphones and cameras on a congressional hearing.

All the networks will be in the Senate Caucus Room on the first day: ABC, NBC, CBS, the Cable News Network and public television. C-Span, the public affairs programming service seen on cable systems, is breaking from the herd and showing the hearings in their entirety in the evening.

"Since all the other networks and CNN talked about going live, we'll offer something else," said C-Span's Kathy Murphy. "We are planning on airing as much as possible."

With the exception of CNN, however, the networks are hedging their bets. They will continually weigh the interest in a given witness in deciding whether to push aside the game shows, sitcom reruns, talk shows and soap operas that make up daytime television.

"Ordinarily, unless you have a star witness — and so far there are only three of those — you pay dearly, you lose audience," said CNN's Executive Vice President

Ed Turner. "If an event creates genuine news, then the audience will build."

Bob McFarland, Washington bureau chief and vice president of NBC News, said: "We'll broadcast testimony of the heavy hitters. We are going on the air at 10 a.m. (EDT) Tuesday and how long we will stay on is up to what's going on. We'll err on the side of overcoverage rather than undercoverage."

CBS said Dan Rather will anchor the coverage, at least on Day 1. ABC said Peter Jennings will do its evening broadcast from Washington on Tuesday.

The Public Broadcasting Service will transmit at least opening day to its 317 stations. "We'll make decisions on additional live coverage day by day, depending on the newsworthiness," said PBS official Mary Jane McKinnern.

There will be no lack of coverage on radio either. The Mutual Broadcasting System will offer its station-clients live coverage Tuesday on one of its multiple channels.

Associated Press Radio plans two-minute special reports during the morning rush hour and summaries in the evening for the duration of the hearings. "We will have special extended live coverage as developments warrant," managing editor Brad Kalbfeld said. "We want to do the maximum."

He was with the American Broadcasting Company in Chicago for eight years. He and his wife, Alice, were married in 1953.

"My father was never happy when I was working in Chicago, even when I was making good money," Caine said. "It was really a dog-eat-dog world."

Caine said he complained about the situation to his wife, who finally told him to "stop complaining about it or quit and go back to school." Caine decided to quit.

He did go back to school, receiving a master's degree from K-State in 1957.

Caine taught music in the public schools of Leonardville and Riley County after he left Chicago.

"We stayed there (Leonardville) for five years and we loved it. Those were probably the best years," Caine said.

After two years of teaching in California, he returned to Manhattan in 1962. Not long after, Luther Leavengood, then head of the music department, persuaded him to join the faculty.

"I knew this would be it when I took the job," Caine said. "I can't say I hadn't considered other possibilities, but you can't look backward. I knew I would be here until retirement."

Thinking back over his plans and the results, Caine said, "I did primarily what I wanted to do."

One of his most vivid memories at K-State was the Nichols Gymnasium fire in 1968.

"It was a tragic thing," he said. "We had just recovered from the Auditorium fire in 1965," he said. Priceless possessions were lost, and the department had just begun to recoup their losses when they were burned out again.

"It (the Nichols fire) really did wipe out the music department...it was a tough time."

However, Caine said, if the fires hadn't happened, McCain Auditorium would not exist today.

Caine said during the interim between the Nichols fire and the construction of McCain, the music department basically worked out of four trailers used for classrooms, offices, practice rooms, a band room and the journalism department's radio station.

The trailers were given to K-State by Washburn University, which had used them while recovering from a tornado that destroyed part of its campus.

Caine jokingly said he is not planning to go fishing when he retires, even though many people have asked if that is what he'll do. He may continue to give private lessons to a few students in a home studio.

He also plans to catalog music in the form of books and records that he has collected over the years. Some of this includes his parents' music, Caine said.

Coliseum

in. If it is closed, then all they have to do is knock."

North stressed the significance of communication in a job such as coliseum director.

"Communication is very important; a slip of the tongue can ruin everything," he said. "Written communication is just as important; contracts and even office memos must be to the point."

There would be a transition period switching from directing an established coliseum to directing a new coliseum.

"It is like a honeymoon period. You have to get to know the place and iron out all the wrinkles before there is any smooth sailing."

North also described the kind of personnel selection he would foster at K-State.

"I will hire people who have goals and want to climb the ladder," he said. "Delegating authority is essential, but they (personnel) must be left alone to do their jobs."

The second candidate for the position, Charles E. Thomas Jr., will have an open meeting from 9:55 to 10:55 a.m. today in Union 213. Students, faculty and staff can attend. Thomas is associate director of Sun Dome Inc. at the University of South Florida, Tampa, where he received his bachelor's degree.

Faculty member challenges loss of position

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

A recent nonrenewal of a faculty contract reveals that sex discrimination is "clearly evident" at K-State, a veterinary medicine bacteriologist charged last week.

Synthea Maas, assistant professor of veterinary diagnosis, said she received notice Feb. 25 that her appointment would not be renewed. The reasons given by her supervisor, M.S. Vorhies, head of the Department of Veterinary Diagnosis, were that she lacked adequate supervisory skills and lacked the bench skills expected of a veterinarian with a doctorate degree.

Maas said if the reasons given for her nonrenewal are true, then her superiors should be able to justify and provide factual support for their position.

However, she said the day Vorhies advised her of her nonrenewal, he stated there had been "no complaints whatsoever" regarding the bacteriology results during the time she was responsible for the section.

Contract nonrenewal reveals discrimination, Maas charges

Given the lack of substance of the reasons given, Maas said her nonrenewal is based on impermissible reasons which include a combination of discrimination based upon the exercise of her academic freedom, freedom of speech and thought, and sex.

Maas was hired by former Department Head Harry Anthony Feb. 10, 1986, and began working July 1. She said she contacted James Coffman, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, about the nonrenewal.

"He informed me he had accepted the recommendation of Dr. Vorhies and stated it was his understanding that the appointment was not being renewed because of interpersonal relationships that affected the functional aspects of the bacteriology laboratory in the veterinary diagnostic lab," Maas said.

The reasons have no rational basis, she said.

"I believe this action is arbitrary and capricious," she said in a letter to Vorhies and Coffman. "My nonrenewal would not have occurred but for my gender and the perception that my reappointment is not essential to the support of my family."

Maas said when she spoke with Vorhies about her nonrenewal, he suggested that she should be content to return to Kansas City, where her husband is employed as a pathologist.

Maas said she is the only unclassified permanent female faculty member in the department.

"I can see that professional women are badly under-represented in this department, the College of Veterinary Medicine and indeed the University as a whole," she said.

An environment in which there are few women in high-ranking academic and administrative positions may have led to her non-reappointment, Maas said.

"I cannot, however, either as an individual, or as a woman, accept this result," she said.

Maas said the issue was not only a professional matter, but a moral and ethical one as well.

In response to Maas's letter, Coffman and Vorhies wrote to her and said they denied the truth of many statements she had made.

"We believe that the letter suggests a misunderstanding on your part of the nature of faculty appointments during the probationary period, prior to consideration for tenure," they said.

During the probationary period, faculty members have no claim to their positions and the University is not required to justify its decisions concerning reappointment, Maas was told.

Maas said although her superiors do not believe that the University assumes the burden of demonstrating the validity of its reasons, the Faculty Handbook says a faculty member may question whatever reasons are given and that the reasons cannot be justified if they are inaccurate or if the nonrenewal is based on other impermissible reasons.

University policy requires that faculty members in their first year of service be informed by March 1 if their contracts will not be renewed.

Maas received notice Feb. 25, two working days before the deadline.

In their letter, Coffman and Vorhies told Maas if she wished to appeal the decision, she should request a review by the General Faculty Grievance Board. If she believed the nonrenewal was because of her sex, they said she should appeal to the Discrimination Review Board for Faculty.

Maas proceeded to contact Provost Owen Koeppel and request that he overrule the decision that her contract not be renewed.

Koeppel wrote back, saying he had given careful consideration to her request and discussed the matter at length with persons in the College of Veterinary Medicine and the administration.

"I have received a number of phone calls and one letter on your behalf," he said. "I have decided that I will not overrule Dean Coffman's decision."

Friday Maas asked President Jon Wefald to conduct an examination into the reasons for her nonrenewal.

Wheat sale effects on market unclear

By CHRIS DOLL
Staff Writer

While the recent grain sale to the Soviet Union cannot hurt Kansas farmers, it is impossible to tell how beneficial it will be, said Bill Tierney, professor of agricultural economics.

The United States plans to sell the Soviets 147 million bushels of wheat. It is the first major sale to the Soviets since 1984, when they brought 279 bushels of wheat. Last year, 7 million bushels were sold to the Soviet Union.

"It's next to impossible to tell how it's going to affect (the market)," Tierney said. "Without a doubt (the sale) didn't make prices lower."

The sale could only help the market, said Harvey Kiser, associate professor of agricultural economics, but the amount is not large enough to have a drastic effect. "Every little bit that you can sell helps (the market)," he said.

"A little bit," is what the purchase amounts to. While 147 million bushels may seem like a lot of wooden baskets, it is only about 8 percent of the wheat left over from last year. The U.S. government is holding about 1.8 billion bushels of the commodity in surplus, Kiser said.

In other words, the amount the Soviets are going to purchase is less than half of the expected 1987 Kansas harvest, according to The Associated Press.

Another reason why the sale is welcomed — but not expected to make an ultimate strong market skyrocket — is the number of factors affecting wheat prices, including crop conditions, current prices and demand for the commodity.

For instance, if the Soviet Union's purchase pushes the price of wheat too high, ranchers will feed their cattle with cheaper grains like corn. At the same time, farmers may consider planting more wheat because of the high prices. Collectively, these factors would mean higher supply of wheat without any increase in demand.

Another factor is the wheat harvest itself. Each year, the price of wheat falls during harvest time to reflect the increase of supply.

"At some point (the prices) are going to run into harvest pressure," Tierney said.

The sale to the Soviet Union meets the minimum requirement of a long-term grain agreement between the two countries. Last year, the Soviets did not purchase the minimum they had contracted to buy from the United States. Because American prices were not competitive in the world market, the Soviets said they were not obligated to buy the minimum amount.

Since then, the United States developed the Export Enhancement Program, allowing grain exporting companies to sell grains internationally at competitive prices. The U.S. government will pay the companies, in wheat, the difference between what the companies pay for the grain and the selling price.

Competitive prices are offered to countries in which the United States and European Common Market compete, such as the Soviet Union and some African countries, Kiser said. Other countries like Japan — the No. 1 buyer of American wheat — are not offered the cheaper prices.

Loss of accreditation may 'benefit' journalism department

By SUSAN L. DAWSON
Managing Editor

The Department of Journalism and Mass Communications has lost its accreditation, and faculty members have unanimously decided not to appeal the measure.

During a departmental meeting Tuesday, the faculty approved a plan to reapply for accreditation in two years, the earliest time possible allowed to reapply.

Carol Oukrop, head of the department, said the loss of accreditation could ultimately prove beneficial to the department.

"We can work this for the advantage of the school," Oukrop said. "We see this as a clear signal to the administration that a department can't run on a diet of biting the bullet."

"This truly is not a disaster." Accreditation, a measure of teaching and learning standards, involves a three-step process: an on-site visit, committee recommendation and the council decision.

Oukrop and Robert Bontrager, professor of journalism and mass communications, traveled to the Accrediting Council on Education in Journalism and Mass Communications meeting in New York May 1-3, where the team report and the committee recommendation were reviewed by the council and a final decision was made. Jack Carpenter, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, accompanied them.

As of Tuesday, the department had received no official word of why accreditation was not granted.

But, Oukrop said, "We had some hints of why (the department was denied accreditation) before we went."

In a letter to Oukrop dated March 30, the council's Accrediting Committee considered the site visit team's report and decided to deny re-accreditation. Oukrop said the on-site team, which visited K-State Nov. 31-Dec. 3, judged the department on its last six years of performance, from 1980-86. The team had submitted a recommendation in favor of re-accrediting the department on a provisional basis, requiring that one year after accreditation, the council would check on the program's advancement.

The committee listed deficiencies in four areas as cause for denial: curriculum, budget, faculty scholarship and inadequate faculty supervision of internships.

'We see this as a clear signal to the administration that a department can't run on a diet of biting the bullet.'

— Carol Oukrop

The department had an 84/36 rule stating that majors must have 84-90 hours outside of journalism and 30-36 hours of coursework within the department. The phase-out of the 84/36 requirement began in 1985, and the 1986-88 catalog indicates the department requires 90 hours outside of the department.

For accreditation, a minimum of 90 hours outside journalism is required by the council, with 65 of those being in the College of Arts and Sciences.

While the formal denial is expected in a few weeks, Oukrop speculated the 84/36 rule may be one reason for the loss of accreditation.

Journalism faculty members instruct an average of three classes in addition to advising students, Oukrop said. There are about 600 declared journalism majors and 13 full-time faculty members. It is the largest department in the largest college on campus.

Students in the department may choose from five journalism options: advertising, general, news-editorial, public relations and radio-television. In addition, students in human ecology and mass communication, agricultural journalism and journalism education take classes from faculty in the department.

The department's 1986-87 budget for other operating expenses is $22,066. The fund pays for general expenses and does not include faculty, classified employee or student employee salaries.

The budget was reduced 15 percent as part of the cutbacks mandated by President Jon Wefald last fall.

A pledge of resources was made by the president, provost and dean in an attempt to reverse the decision of the committee, said Dave Adams, director of Student Publications Inc. and associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

"I think the Board of Regents itself has been worried and warned the Legislature that lack of funding has been a key worry, and that Kansas higher education may, in fact, be slipping into mediocrity. And I wonder if this (the loss of accreditation) is not an outward sign that we are."

Adams said he hopes alumni and employers of K-State journalism graduates will help in funding the department.

"One of the ironies is K-State has as good a reputation with media employers of Kansas as any other journalism program in the state," he said. "I hope...they will get behind a major fund-raising effort so this program can perform better than it has ever been, so it can truly be a center of excellence for the University rather than merely an acceptable journalism program."

Harry Marsh, professor of journalism and mass communications and former department head, agreed.

"Certainly this will send a loud signal across the state of Kansas to the alumni of this program and to employers who hire our students with enthusiasm that we need support," Marsh said.

"This University has done quite well in, I think, producing good publications, good training for students and winning national recognition," Adams said. "But at the same time, it's a good indicator that students are learning what they should be learning in the classes they are taking in journalism."

Tribunal orders return of assets

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — The Iran-United States Claims Tribunal has ordered America to return $451.4 million in frozen Iranian assets. At U.S. urging, the tribunal stressed that the fate of American hostages in Lebanon was not linked to the return.

The arbitration panel ruling apparently solved a running dispute between the two nations over assets the United States concedes belong to Iran, which needs money to finance its 6½-year-old war with Iraq.

The funds were frozen after the 1979 Iranian revolution that overthrew the Shah and installed Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's Islamic fundamentalist government.

In its ruling, the tribunal said its award had "no relations or link whatsoever to the issues of hostages held in Lebanon or any other political matter." A copy of the Monday ruling was obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press.

'Integrity, honor' intact, Hart says

NEW YORK — Gary Hart, his presidential campaign in jeopardy after a report he spent Friday night with a Miami model, on Tuesday admitted he made a mistake "by putting myself in circumstances that could be misconstrued," but declared he "absolutely did not" do anything immoral.

The Democratic front-runner denounced the story published in The Miami Herald on Sunday as "misleading and false" and said it had hurt him and his family and left him struggling "to maintain my integrity and my honor."

A determined Hart said he had made a mistake but would continue his bid for the 1988 Democratic nomination.

"Let me assure you that my campaign has just begun," the former Colorado senator said. "As I've said, I don't intend to give up because the cause is more important than the candidate."

In his first public appearance since the story was published, Hart spoke to the American Newspaper Publishers Association about the story, then delivered a prepared 17-page speech about his economic policies.

Secord breaks silence to testify

WASHINGTON — Former Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard V. Secord, leading off the congressional Iran-Contra hearings on Tuesday, traced profits from secret Iranian arms sales to Nicaraguan rebels and declared Reagan administration officials supported his efforts to help the Contras.

Breaking months of silence, Secord told the nationally broadcast, joint House-Senate hearing that about $3.5 million in profits from the arms sales was diverted to the Contras through a Swiss bank account controlled by him and an associate.

He said he discussed his activities on three occasions with then-CIA Director William Casey and frequently was in contact with Marine Lt. Col. Oliver North, the fired White House national security aide, and with other administration officials — all at a time Congress had banned military aid to the Nicaraguan rebels.

Secord, during the first public sworn testimony linking the Iran arms sales with money for the Contras, said he "understood that this administration knew of my conduct and approved it."

President Reagan, meanwhile, said, "I'm waiting to hear as much as anyone else."

He denied anew that he had known of any illegal fund raising or diversion of money.

REGIONAL

Kansas to refuse Oklahoma waste

TOPEKA — Kansas does not intend to get stuck disposing of 2.3 million cubic feet of radioactive sludge now sitting at a plant in Gore, Okla., Gov. Mike Hayden and Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Tuesday.

The pair informed Kansas' partners in the Central Interstate Low Level Radioactive Waste Compact that if Kansas is chosen to host a regional waste dump, the facility will not be designed to store the sludge and will not accept the waste.

A Kerr-McGee Corp., subsidiary, called Sequoyah Fuels Corp., has 2 million cubic feet of radioactive raffinate sludge and 360,000 cubic feet of radioactive calcium fluoride sludge awaiting disposal at a nuclear fuel production plant.

The compact is an association of five states — Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana — created as a means of finding one central location for a regional radioactive waste dump capable of holding 5 million cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste.

KU student loses leg in accident

LAWRENCE — A University of Kansas student was critically injured Tuesday when his legs were crushed between two parked cars that were struck by another vehicle, police said.

John Buzbee, 21, of Hutchinson, the son of Richard E. Buzbee, editor and publisher of The Hutchinson News, was listed in critical condition following surgery at the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Nancy Miller, a hospital spokeswoman, said Buzbee's left leg was amputated below the knee and his right leg was badly fractured.

Police Lt. Mark Brothers said a car driven by another student went out of control about 2 a.m. on a curve on Stewart Avenue in an area of fraternity and sorority houses. The car glanced off one parked car, then struck a second parked car and pushed it into another parked car.

Police said Buzbee was standing between the last two parked vehicles when the accident occurred.

Five other people — two pedestrians and three occupants of the car — suffered minor injuries.

Buzbee, a staff writer for The University Daily Kansan, was recently elected president of the KU chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, for the upcoming school year. He had recently completed an internship at the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times.

Search for Fort Riley soldier ends

WAKEFIELD — Authorities hampered by high water and rough weather have called off the search for a Fort Riley soldier believed drowned in Milford Lake.

Clay County Sheriff Gary Caldwell halted the two-week search for Pfc. David Ellison on Monday, and said Tuesday he did not know when the search could be resumed.

"It depends on the water," he said. "At the rate that it's been dropping, it could be another week or 10 days," but this week's rain could further delay efforts.

Caldwell said boat searches, which have been conducted continuously since Ellison disappeared from a bridge over the lake April 21, probably will not be resumed. High winds have made it difficult to send boats out, he said.

Pfc. Shannon Steed, who was riding in the car Ellison was driving April 21, told authorities that Ellison stopped on the Wakefield Causeway Bridge when he became ill, got out, leaned over the railing and fell. Ellison was believed to have fallen about 50 feet into 35 feet of water.

Dean to serve as interim provost until Koeppe's successor named

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Until a search committee completes the selection of a permanent replacement, the dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine will serve as acting provost.

University President Jon Wefald announced Tuesday that Dean James Coffman will become acting provost effective July 1, as Provost Owen Koeppe leaves the post to return to teaching.

Wefald said the decision to have Coffman act as temporary provost was made last weekend, after he discussed the matter with some of the University deans.

"When I talked with these deans, Coffman's name came up over and over again," he said. "Jim Coffman has great respect from his colleagues and people all over the state, including the Board of Regents. I decided he would be an excellent person for the position."

Coffman said he was excited about his appointment as acting provost because it would allow him to be involved in the Strategic Planning Program, giving him major opportunities in program development.

"This is an exciting time to be in the position as we are in the early stages of this plan," he said. "It will be my highest priority."

Coffman contrasted his role as a college dean with that of the University provost.

"Both positions are similar in the sense that they involve making the most of everyone's talents," he said. "But they are different in that I will be working with a wide variety of talent."

Wefald said that a new search committee will be assembled within the next two or three weeks to continue the work of the previous committee, which, for the past six months, succeeded in securing four finalists for the position.

Three candidates, however, withdrew their applications. Last week, the single remaining candidate, Milton Glick of the University of Missouri-Columbia, declined the offer to become the University's chief academic officer and said he plans to remain dean of arts and sciences there.

Wefald said he is forming the new committee because he wished to relieve members of the former committee of the extraordinary demands of time. The appointment of Coffman would allow the new committee more time to conduct a thorough search.

"We're not sure yet when a final replacement will be found — that will depend on the search committee. We're hoping to find a new provost sometime within the next year," he said.

Coffman said he expected the new committee to announce the new provost in January 1988.

John Noordsy, associate dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, will serve as acting dean while Coffman serves as acting provost. Coffman said the administrative structure of the college will remain the same.

Coffman has been dean of the college since July 1984. He graduated from K-State in 1960. He earned his doctorate of veterinary medicine here in 1962 and also received his master's degree in clinical pathology from the University.

Groups look for candidates to occupy 3 campus offices

By The Collegian Staff

Search committees have been active this semester in their quest for people to fill administrative positions across the K-State campus.

Four candidates for the newly created position of director of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum have been attending on-campus interviews throughout the week.

"After the evaluations are received, we can look at them next week. Perhaps by the following week we will be able to make a selection," said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

Charles R. Barber, the third candidate, will attend a forum open to the public from 2:45 to 3:45 p.m. today in Union 206. Thursday, the final candidate, George Riedel, will speak at an open forum from 9:55 to 10:55 a.m. in Union 206.

The 13,500-seat multipurpose facility will open before the fall of 1988. The coliseum director will assume the position around July 1. Duties include developing contracts with local, state and regional agencies for talent and events to attain maximum building use, and working with campus groups and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics in using the coliseum.

The last of five candidates for the position of dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, William P. Weber, will address college faculty from 3:30 to 5 p.m. Thursday in Willard Hall 114.

The search committee will meet over the weekend and make their recommendations to Provost Owen Koeppe next week, said Burt Kaufman, professor of history and committee chairman.

Even though the interviews have been conducted, the search for a director of Personnel Services is still in progress. The committee has received all references for the four candidates and is reviewing the candidates' applications. Miller said a decision will be reached within the next two weeks.

Interviews have been completed for the position of general manager of University Physical Facilities, Miller said, adding that he is in consultation with regard to the four candidates and may be able to make a statement about the selection next week.

"Everyone who came here is still interested in continuing as a candidate," he said. "They are all real fine candidates, and all are interested in coming to K-State."

"It makes the selection process a little more difficult, but we prefer being in that kind of position."

Finalist says promotion vital

By RITA GRAVES
Collegian Reporter

Although the Fred Bramlage Coliseum has the disadvantage of being in a small community, there are ways to circumvent this problem, said Charles E. Thomas Jr., second of four candidates for the new position of coliseum director.

Thomas, associate director of the Sun Dome Inc. at the University of South Florida, Tampa, spoke during an open meeting Tuesday morning in the Union.

The primary duty of a coliseum director should be to promote the building, he said.

"A way to be competitive with other area facilities, for example, those in Kansas City, is through creative finance," Thomas said.

One example would be a special payment plan in which campus organizations such as the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics would not be required to pay for the facility's use before a group's appearance.

One advantage to the coliseum is that a new building is not difficult to promote, Thomas said.

"The novelty of the building being new will draw people," he said. "We just have to make sure the first experience in the coliseum is a good one."

In addition, Manhattan's small size and location could work to the coliseum's advantage when competing for student money.

"Tampa is so big that we have to compete with other outside sources for the student dollar," he said. Due to Manhattan's size and location, the University will not have to compete against other forms of entertainment within the community for student money.

In addition to finding sources of income, a second issue was the role the coliseum would play in the University and Manhattan.

"There has got to be a workability between the University and the director of the coliseum," he said, adding that no one is going to agree 100 percent on how the coliseum should be used.

"The major advantage of the coliseum is K-State has a community that's going to support it," he said.

The third candidate for the position, Charles R. Barber, will have an open meeting today from 2:45 to 3:45 p.m. in Union 206. Barber is director of the public assembly facilities at the Cajundome in Lafayette, La.

University should find provost answers soon

The University has taken steps to temporarily fill the position of provost — the highest academic office at K-State — but what about the long term?

A University selection committee reviewed applications for provost and narrowed the field to four candidates who were interviewed on campus in March.

After visiting campus, one by one each candidate dropped out of the race citing this or that reason for doing so until only one candidate remained — Milton Glick, dean of arts and sciences at the University of Missouri, Columbia.

When the University offered Glick the job, he decided he wanted to stay at MU instead.

A major university like K-State should not have any trouble find-ding a qualified candidate to fill a position of prominence like provost. The responsibilities of this job are tremendous as the deans of all nine colleges report to the provost, who answers only to the University president.

If something they saw upon coming to K-State made all four candidates withdraw from the race, the University must find out what it was and correct the problem before anyone will be willing to accept the job permanently.

The budget cuts the University has undergone this year may be one major reason applicants have shied away from the post once they saw the reality of the current situation at K-State.

Let's just hope the damage isn't permanent.

Despite early turmoil, Coliseum to be reality

The Fred Bramlage Coliseum. Two years ago, the mere mention of the name caused plenty of blood to boil.

Complaints ranged from who should pay for the facility to how much it should cost and how many people it should seat. For quite some time, it seemed the project may never get off the ground.

Redesign of the structure — which was to originally contain 16,000 seats at a total cost of $16.1 million — became necessary in August 1985 after the lowest construction bid came in $1.8 million above the estimates.

Then several Board of Regents members voted against continuation of the project because there had not been enough examination of other possibilities, such as renovation of Ahearn Field House. Many expressed concern that the coliseum, if reduced in size, would be a single-purpose facility that would serve only varsity athletics and not be the multi-purpose facility to which students committed $7.1 million in 1981. Others complained that the scaled-down version would lack the "plushness" that was originally promised.

While many complaints may have been valid and opponents continue to voice their opinions, the fact is that the coliseum is a reality. With construction in full swing and running on schedule, it is scheduled to open in October 1988.

Like it or not, we must accept this newest addition to the campus. Though we may not want to admit it, the new facility can cause an increase in basketball ticket sales and will be attractive to potential recruits. In short, it could be a major selling point for the University.

And let's face it. Stronger athletic programs result in an increase in pride, which can result in an increase in enrollment. And, after all, isn't that the name of the game?

End of year no excuse for senseless partying

The end of the school year is almost here. This means graduation for some — the true end to life as we students have known it for the last 16 years of our lives.

For those not graduating, the feeling of accomplishment in finishing another semester can be almost as great. As these feelings grow and the end-of-the-year partying begins, remember not to make it an end to lives. Having fun and celebrating the end of the year does not have to get out of hand.

The sad stories reported each year around this time happen as some celebrating student ends up taking his own life. While the stories may seem few and far between compared to the number of students finishing school each year, the fact remains that any death that is accidental is needless and most times can be avoided.

School is something that trains us to become responsible citizens and make our place in society. Everybody makes their place in a different way, in their own way. The specialization of having a major helps define how one is going to find his or her niche in this world.

The sad part comes when someone is killed needlessly while celebrating the passage to another stage of life. The next stage should not be death.

Care should be taken and not cast aside while commemorating and having fun. Don't take stupid risks with alcohol, driving, swimming etc. — use the BADD cab services if necessary. Take the time to make it the best time of your life, not the last time. As corny as it may sound, smart thinking will not ruin the fun, it will just make it last.

U.S. oblivious to Mideast crisis

Let me draw a picture for you: Imagine your hometown is suddenly besieged by people from many different countries with a heritage and religion that are alien to you. These people are refugees, victims of a horrendous campaign of repression and extermination. They come to your town seeking to escape the racial and religious persecution that has plagued their people for centuries.

In an attempt to ensure an end to the persecution, they decide to make your town a homeland for their people. The government will now be controlled by them, and they will be the only people with the right to vote. They adopt an official language and religion different from your own. Because of your race and religion, you are denied citizenship and the rights that go with it. You are considered an alien in your own country.

But the new residents don't stop there. They need land for all of the new refugees who keep coming every day. They start forcing the newly created "aliens" from their homes and farms. Many leave for newly formed refugee camps in neighboring countries. Those who resist are imprisoned or killed outright. Literature about this injustice is banned, and even displaying the former flag of the country can land you in jail.

You can stop imagining now because this picture is real. It is not a picture of the Soviet Union or South Africa, although the basic programs of repression are similar. The country represented here is a U.S. ally and the largest recipient of U.S. foreign aid. It is the country of Israel, formerly known as Palestine.

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

This is a situation that is very confusing to the general population of America. Most people in this country cannot see both sides of this story. America has the largest Jewish population of any country in the world, including Israel. Add to this the obvious racism towards Arabs (see Patti Paxson's column in the April 28 Collegian) and you have a situation where the American people are only capable of understanding one culture, that of the Israelis. This leads to blind support for Israeli policies and an ignorance of the big picture.

One of the misconceptions Americans hold about this situation is the role of race and its relationship to conflict. Whenever one takes a pro-Palestinian stand, the common response is to cry anti-Semitism. However, this is pure fiction. Palestinians, unlike Adolf Hitler, cannot possibly be anti-Semitic. Jews and Palestinians originated from the same tribes of Semite people. In order for Palestinians to be anti-Semitic, they would have to be against themselves.

This ignorance of the American people about the plight of the Palestinians allows Israel to engage in such oppressive measures. Almost every week, Israeli soldiers kill Palestinian students on university campuses in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. In 1982, the Israeli army oversaw the massacre at the refugee camps of Sabra and Shatilla, where more than a thousand civilians were killed in a two-day bloody rampage. Palestinians are still thrown in jail without charge, and it is still illegal to publish pro-Palestinian literature.

But this banning of literature may not be limited to Israel for long. Kansas Sen. Bob Dole has stated recently the government should close down the Palestinian Liberation Organization's United Nations observer mission office and the PLO information office in New York. Here is a clear example of how much Dole values free speech. He is so afraid of the American people finding out the truth that he is willing to violate the U.N.'s charter and the first amendment of the U.S. Constitution to preserve American ignorance.

How can the people of Israel, after having experienced the wrath of Hitler, impose much the same system on the people of Palestine? Why does America continue to support such repression? Why does Dole want to silence the Palestinians? Why does Pat Muir think purple trash cans are more important than thousands of lives and billions of dollars? Why does Muir think at all?

If there are answers to these questions, I would like to know what they are so I can stop paying for Israeli oppression of the people of Palestine and Muir's repression of rational thought. Then the world could be a better place to live for all of us.

Contra war atrocities U.S. officials at heart of killings

"It is my opinion they don't care because they are not well-informed."

Patrick Muir, Collegian Columnist
I would like to thank one of my fellow columnists for providing me with a topic for this final column of the semester. In Monday's Collegian, my colleague offered this advice to current and future Collegian columnists:

"The majority of this campus doesn't care what side of the Central American conflict you support. If we want that kind of information we can look it up from professional sources, not Last Chance groupies."

Interestingly, the same columnist argues the reason that students are indifferent about student government affairs is that they are uninformed. Following this logic, would it not seem that if students are also unconcerned with the war in Central America, it is only because they are also uninformed?

Whether the majority of this campus really doesn't care I'm not sure; however, if one of my colleagues thinks that is the case, then perhaps an informative column on some of the more disgusting aspects of the Contra war is in order. Before I begin though, I should assure my readers that the information in this column comes from "professional sources," not Last Chance groupies, Frank Sinatra songs or Mike Riley.

Currently, the joint Congressional committees investigating the Iran-Contra affair are in their second day of hearings. Already Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, and chairman of the Senate committee, has said President Reagan knew money was being raised to supply arms to the Contras. He pointed out that this violated the spirit of the Boland Amendment, which prohibits Americans from giving military support to forces fighting a government with which the United States is not at war.

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

Ironically, the Boland Amendment was passed in 1983, after a furious Congress learned of the CIA's secret mining of Nicaraguan harbors. Reagan first acknowledged private efforts to support the Contras in October 1986, after mercenary Eugene Hasenfus' supply plane was shot down.

In addition to the congressional hearings, two reporters — Tony Avirgan and Martha Honey — have filed a $17 million lawsuit against a secret team of current and retired U.S. military and intelligence officers.

The team, which has been responsible for waging covert wars and attempting assassinations in the third world for the past 25 years, includes retired major generals Richard Secord and John Singlaub, Iranian-American businessman Albert Hakim, retired CIA officers Theodore Shackley and Thomas Clines, as well as devout anti-Communist Cuban and close George Bush associate Felix Rodriguez.

The suit against the group stems in part from injuries Avirgan received in 1984 when the secret team attempted to bomb a news conference being conducted by disgruntled former Contra leader Eden Pastora. Eight people were killed by the blast, while Avirgan and 23 others were injured.

The secret team had decided to kill

Pastora because he refused CIA demands to integrate his forces into the Honduran-based Contra forces. Avirgan and Honey later learned that the explosives were supplied by John Hull, a U.S. citizen and CIA operative whose farms in Costa Rica are used as Contra bases. Avirgan and Honey also claim Hull's farms are used as landing sights for cocaine trafficking aircraft.

But even more interesting, the two reporters discovered the secret team was also behind a plot to kill Lewis Tambs, the U.S. Ambassador to Costa Rica, in hopes of blaming the Sandinistas for the murder.

Pablo Escobar, one of Columbia's biggest cocaine producers, offered a $1 million reward for killing Tambs after Tambs, then ambassador to Columbia, had ordered a drug crackdown. According to an article in the Guardian, the reward was to be used to purchase arms for the Contras.

The secret team's activities in Central America go back as far as the late '70s, when it offered its assassination services to former Nicaraguan dictator Anastasio Somoza. By 1979, when Somoza was driven from power, members of the group met with leaders of the ousted Nicaraguan National Guard to form what was to become the Contras.

Although these matters have been given rather slight coverage by the major news sources, perhaps they will be given the attention they deserve in the present investigations.

Letters

Good justification

Editor,
I would like to reply to the letter "Iranian joke" in the April 30 Collegian. First of all, I would like to state that I am neither Iraqi nor Iranian and therefore am standing on neutral ground.

I have read the letter "Iranian joke" along with the two preceding letters and numerous other articles in various publications pertaining to the same subject. In the Collegian May 1, I read a clarification on the letter "Union does exist." This letter was the subject matter for "Iranian joke."

The clarification stated that "Union does exist" was written by an Iraqi student. Any reader with his eyes open would have noticed this. The reasons for the name of the Iraqi student being withheld should be obvious. The Ba'athist regime in Iraq doesn't hesitate to execute those who oppose it, both abroad and their families in Iraq.

To further explain my views, I would like to refer to an April 16 incident in Pakistan. Two Iraqi students who had openly opposed Saddam's terrorist regime after being expelled from Iraq were beheaded. Also, on Dec. 7, 1979, two newspapers in Britain, The Guardian and the Times Higher Education Supplement, obtained lists of the Iraqi students who were scheduled for execution in Britain.

Saddam Hussein hasn't denied responsibility for these and other terrorist acts throughout the world. Instead, he has resorted to the use of hit squads to execute his critics. Due to the rising numbers of Ba'athist terrorist acts, it is plain to see why an Iraqi student is afraid to print his or her name in opposition to Saddam.

Muir's failings

Editor,
The Collegian columnists can generally be divided into two categories — those who write on personal experiences and those who write on issues. This semester K-State was treated to "Life According to (Patrick) Muir," which attempted to straddle the boundary between the two realms.

Muir took on a difficult task and, in my view, he failed. Except for within one column, he merely addressed relevant issues with quips. This disappointed me because he seemed to be a reasonable and intelligent person at first.

In his final column, Muir encouraged other columnists to "lighten up" because "the majority of this campus does not care what side of the Central American conflict you support....If we want that kind of information we can look it up from professional sources, not Last Chance groupies."

It is apparent he has little regard for students who may be more knowledgeable than himself on a particular issue and that he relies only on the popular press for information on contemporary issues. It is a shame that he and many others pass up both the opportunity to read alternative and scholarly material and the numerous scholarly lectures K-State and the Manhattan community have offered on the topic of Central America. Perhaps the pursuit of critical ideas will not make Muir popular.

Muir proceeded to encourage students to become active on issues, but only campus issues. He does not seem to care that his prime audience is the age group that fights in wars. It is also composed of many people who are seeking jobs in the defense industry.

Underlying Muir's writings are the apparent beliefs that students' views on national issues do not matter and students should not share the fruits of their education with one another.

Yet, curiously Muir asks "Are we waiting for another war (in order) to be taken seriously in the political arena?" Many students are not waiting, and they are being taken seriously by some other students and a few political leaders.

Longhorn mistakes

Editor,
Since much of my career has been devoted to research on carcass and meat traits of different types and breeds of cattle, I read Erin Mulcahy's article on Longhorns in Monday's Collegian with interest. I certainly agree with Dr. Gillespie's statement that there is a certain prejudice and ignorance about this breed of cattle. There are few objective studies on Longhorns, but most of this prejudice and ignorance exists because breeders ignore the information that is available. Consequently, incorrect statements often are made about Longhorns.

Dr. Gillespie was quoted as stating that "the longhorn produces a larger rib-eye found in premium cuts." Wrong! Although not a research study, Kansas Steer Futurity results on over 5,000 cattle of more than 25 breeds and breed crosses show that longhorn crosses had relatively small rib-eyes. In addition, longhorn crosses had the second lightest weaning weights, the slowest feedlot gains, the lightest carcasses and were among the least profitable of the breeds evaluated.

They did have relatively high marbling scores, which supports Gillespie's statement that Longhorns produce high quality beef. California research shows that longhorn crosses had smaller rib-eyes than Jersey crosses, and Jerseys are the smallest, least muscular breed in North America! In the same study, tenderness of longhorn cross steaks was intermediate to that of Jersey crosses and Herefords.

In a Texas research study on muscling effects on performance and carcass traits, most of the steers in the lightest muscled group (USDA No. 3) were of Holstein, Brahman and Longhorn breeding. Cattle of this muscling group weighed 200 lbs. less at slaughter than cattle in the No. 1 group and had the smallest rib-eyes and lowest dressing percentages.

Dr. Gillespie also was quoted that "no hot-trimming is required (of Longhorns) which means less contamination." This is interesting because hot-trimming of carcasses currently is not allowed for USDA graded beef. Carcasses from Longhorns do have to be trimmed of excess fat before being merchandized as retail cuts, and if trimming fat is "contamination," then Longhorn carcasses are contaminated, too. Longhorns do have less fat covering than several other breeds, but they still deposit excess fat to be trimmed.

Beef cattle production and processing in the United States have become quite intensified in recent years. For that reason, Longhorns have not been included in cattle type/breed research studies. A cooperative research project between the U.S. Meat Animal Research Center and K-State is now under way, which will study several breeds of cattle. Longhorns will be included in this study. Perhaps results from this study will clarify most of the prejudice and ignorance about Longhorns.

Greek liquor laws

Editor,
Give me liquor or give me death. The situation at this school is not that bad yet, but if people do not do something soon, it is going to be that way. Barb Robel is the head of IFC, and the chief instigator of making legislation that will further step on my right to drink.

Robel is pushing to pass legislation within the fraternities to ban drinking at rush parties. She and some other elite members of IFC are out of touch with the people in the greek system. We do not want another rule limiting our drinking rights. Ronald Reagan took the right to drink away from many college students and now Robel wants to take a little more away from us.

I do not know where Barb comes off making rules that enforce laws the civil, state and federal laws already enforce. It seems redundant for Barb to make rules for the fraternities that the government has already made. Maybe Ronnie has personally talked to Barb, but I doubt it.

IFC is on a power trip. It wants to do something, but all it can come up with is a dry rush rule. It will just take away from the dwindling rights of fraternity members to consume alcohol.

Barb, we don't want your legislation of dry rush. If you and the IFC council cannot do anything good for the fraternities, do not do anything at all.

What scares me most is what might be in store for fraternities down the road. If Barb gets her way on this dry rush legislation, what will follow?

What I see as coming after dry rush is no more alcohol at functions. Guaranteed, if dry rush gets passed, dry parties and functions will follow. After that will be the final blow — no alcohol allowed in the fraternities at all. We have to stop this leakage of alcohol from the system before we go thirsty forever. We have to stop this dry rush legislation now, so we can ensure the right to drink for future fraternity members and ourselves.

Lack of coverage

Editor,
The year 1985 was a memorable year for the members of the K-State bowling team. Not only was the women's team ranked 13th in the nation, but the Collegian printed an article about this achievement. That the article was printed at all is amazing and the staff at the Collegian deserves little credit for this since they didn't take the time to write the article they printed because they don't even consider bowling a sport. If it wasn't for one of the coaches who wrote the article himself and personally hand-delivered it, nobody would have known. My only complaint is that with the exception of this one article, the bowling team receives no coverage, and no recognition whatsoever.

For those who don't know, K-State's men's and women's bowling team is just that — a team — not a "club" as it was described in the 1986 Royal Purple yearbook. And like the football and basketball teams, we compete at an intercollegiate level against colleges from Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, Texas and other Kansas colleges. Yes, it's true we have no connection with the athletic department. The Union helps sponsor us and we have a bowl-athon where each member must raise $100 in donations to help pay for the cost of bowling, hotels and food.

Tryouts are during the first week of school. Those who make the team must be taking at least 12 hours and maintain a 2.0 GPA, or they are declared ineligible. To qualify to go to each meet, we must bowl nine games and be among the top five averages. Those who qualify have the opportunity to compete against national champions such as Wichita State University.

When we bowled at K-State, nobody came to cover the meet. When we beat Wichita State, nobody was there to cover it, and at the last meet when two of our members got the high-game award, and the women's team got second place, nobody was there to cover that either.

Buckle up

Editor,
Car crashes kill more people between the ages of 1 and 44 than anything else. In fact, for people in their late teens and early 20s, car crashes account for more than 40 percent of all deaths.

More than 10 of the students who left Kansas colleges for two recent summer vacations did not return. They were drivers who died in crashes on Kansas roads, most of them at speeds under 40 mph and within 25 miles of home.

More than 90 percent of those killed are not wearing safety belts, and 95 percent of those injured are unbuckled. Most of those deaths and injuries could be prevented.

So, use your safety belt this summer; and don't be embarrassed to tell friends who ride with you that they must also buckle up. Last year, nearly 46,000 people died in car wrecks in the United States and 3.5 million were injured. That same year, not one person died from embarrassment — and it didn't hurt a soul.

Think about it. And while you're thinking...buckle up.

Reader confusion

Editor,
Re: The story "AIDS linked with tuberculosis cases" in Friday's Collegian.

I don't know whether the statistical gibberish in your story is due to The Associated Press or your edit/copy desk, but the "sentences" that constitute the second paragraph of your story (especially the second one) are perfect examples of success in confusing any reader.

I think you owe it to your readership to present information of this sort in clear and intelligible form. It might be difficult for an ordinary reader to understand why an increase of 1.7 percent in (?? — it is not easily apparent that this refers to the total of new cases and not the rate of change which the paragraph features) something is so striking.

What is actually striking (and there have been similar stories earlier about the trend in Chicago) is the percent change in the net difference between declining numbers of cases and an increase which is a great deal more than the "puny" 1.7 percent increase in the total number of cases.

Wefald to address graduates

By The Collegian Staff

More than 2,000 students from the Class of 1987 will heave a sigh of relief during the all-university commencement program at 9 a.m. Saturday, May 16, in the KSU Stadium.

According to the Office of Registrar, in addition to the 2,025 students graduating this spring, 1,623 students out of a total class membership of 3,648 have graduated from K-State since May 1986.

University President Jon Wefald and Student Body President Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science, will address the crowd. In addition, awards for outstanding achievements will be given.

Two faculty members will receive the Distinguished Graduate Faculty Member Award, while four faculty will receive the undergraduate teaching award. The University will also award the Alumni Medallion Award, which recognizes outstanding alumni work in their chosen fields and significant contributions to the community, state or nation.

Recipients of honorary doctorates are former Gov. John Carlin, William Bevan and Alfred Schroeder. Carlin, member of the Class of '62, will receive an honorary doctorate of laws.

Bevan, vice president of the MacArthur Foundation, a philanthropic organization, and former head of the Department of Psychology, will receive an honorary doctorate of science. Schroeder, former chief justice of the Kansas Supreme Court and 1937 K-State graduate, will receive an honorary doctorate of humane letters.

Commencement for the Graduate School will begin at 2 p.m. Friday, May 15, in McCain Auditorium, followed by the College of Veterinary Medicine's commencement at 4 p.m. Air Force and Army ROTC will hold a joint commissioning ceremony at noon in the Union Ballroom.

Commencement buffet for Friday's ceremonies will be from 6 to 7:30 p.m., while the buffet for ceremonies on Saturday, May 16, will be from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Both will be held in the Union Bluemont Room and the ballroom. Deadline for reservations is Friday. The cost is $8 for adults and $4 for children.

Undergraduate commencement exercises will begin Saturday. Ceremonies for the College of Arts and Sciences will immediately follow the all-university ceremony in the stadium.

Ceremonies for other colleges are as follows: College of Business Administration will be at 11 a.m. in Ahearn Field House; College of Architecture and Design, 11 a.m., McCain; College of Agriculture, 1 p.m., Ahearn; College of Education, 1 p.m., McCain; College of Engineering, 3 p.m., Ahearn; College of Human Ecology, 3 p.m., McCain.

Also occurring Saturday will be the all-university commencement reception from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Union Courtyard and the Alumni Medallion reception from 10:30-11:45 a.m. in the Union Flint Hills Room.

In the event of inclement weather Saturday morning, the all-university commencement will be canceled, and the arts and sciences college exercises will be rescheduled for 9 a.m. in Ahearn.

Announcements concerning cancellations will be made on radio stations KMAN-AM, Manhattan 1350; WIBW-AM, Topeka 580; KAYS-AM, Hays 1400; and KGNO-AM, Dodge City 1370.

S. African elections prompt boycott, riot

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — On the eve of white parliamentary elections, half a million blacks stayed home from work Tuesday in protest, grenades and land mines exploded and police fought black crowds with birdshot and tear gas.

"The time has come to consult the white electorate about its views on how we should proceed with peaceful reform," President P.W. Botha told the nation's 24 million blacks, who have no vote on national affairs.

The government's Bureau of Information said Botha's message would be distributed in black communities, where labor unions and anti-apartheid groups called for two days of protest against the election.

People monitoring the boycott said that if student boycotts were included, the number of blacks engaging in the protest action could reach 1 million.

Of South Africa's 5 million whites, 3,031,414 were registered to vote for 166 seats in the dominant white House of Assembly when polls open at 7 a.m. today. The three-chamber Parliament includes houses for Indians and people of mixed-race, but those are not up for election until 1989.

Botha called the white election two years early, saying he and his National Party needed a mandate to pursue gradual reform of some discriminatory laws and to give blacks a limited role in national policy-making. He has vowed to resist majority rule and maintain segregated schools and neighborhoods.

The National Party, with 127 seats in the outgoing Parliament, is expected to keep a large majority.

Far-right parties, trying to increase their 18-seat share in Parliament, oppose any modification of apartheid.

The moderate Progressive Federal Party and its allies, with 27 seats in the last Parliament, favor abolition of all racially discriminatory laws and support negotiations that could lead to majority rule.

Five explosions at four sites were reported Monday night and early Tuesday.

U.S. postal rates to increase next year

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The cost of mailing a letter will jump to a quarter sometime next year, and most other postage rates also will rise under a new rate structure proposed Tuesday by the U.S. Postal Service.

The Postal Service Board of Governors voted 5-1 for the new rates, an increase that will average 16 percent over all classes of mail.

Board Chairman John N. Griesemer estimated the additional cost of postage to the average person at less than $10 per year.

In addition to raising the price of a first-class stamp from 22 cents to 25 cents, the board proposed changes in its complex structure of rates for various types of mail.

Prices for the expensive but highly competitive overnight mail would drop somewhat, for example, while rates for advertising bulk mail would rise and those for newspapers and magazines would both increase and decrease.

Deputy Postmaster General Michael Coughlin said it probably would be about a year before new rates could take effect. He said the rate increases, which have been under discussion for several months, were being proposed now because of the lengthy legal processes required to raise postage prices.

Although the Postal Service expects to finish this year in the black, he said, the agency is facing a variety of rising costs including changes in the retirement system for federal workers, rising salaries and the need for new buildings and equipment.

Presidents of two postal unions currently bargaining for a new contract with the Service attacked the rate announcement as an attempt to torpedo the negotiations.

Moe Biller of the American Postal Workers Union and Vincent Sombrutto of the National Association of Letter Carriers contended the Postal Service should have waited a few months until the negotiations were complete. They pledged, however, to continue bargaining in good faith.

Before the increases can take effect, they must be considered by the independent Postal Rate Commission, a process that takes an average of 11 months or more.

Approval by the commission means the new rates can take effect immediately. If not, the Postal Service board can agree to whatever the commission suggests, can start over again with a new filing or can — by a unanimous vote — overrule the commission and put the rates in effect anyway.

The latter prospect was placed in question by the governors' 5-1 vote to seek the new rates. Griesemer declined to identify the dissenter.

The 22-cent first class rate has been in effect since Feb. 17, 1985.

In addition to increasing that rate to 25 cents, the new proposal would increase the charge for each additional ounce of weight for first class mail from 17 cents to 20 cents. Post cards would increase from 14 cents to 16 cents.

Barbecuing and Grilling

Cooking for the die-hards

The smell of barbecued food wafting through the breeze and the sight of meat sizzling and dripping on a grill is enough to make anyone's mouth water.

The art of barbecuing is becoming more popular as newer kinds of grills and techniques are invented, but the basics have been around for years.

According to Greek legend, Prometheus, one of Zeus' sons, created mortal men and women from river clay while his brother, Epimetheus, created animals. While the animals had fur and feathers to keep them warm, the mortals were a bit chilly.

Prometheus felt bad about this and stole some glowing embers from the sacred hearth of the gods, an act that did not make his father very happy. The mortals were happy and showed their thanks and respect for the gift by regularly grilling animals as sacrifices. The aroma pleased the gods and mortals have been grilling ever since.

The first settlers in the United States learned to cook from the local Indians and added the social aura to it by holding large gatherings that centered around the cooking.

The word barbecue has different meanings in different areas of the United States. In the Southwest, a barbecue usually involves cooking a whole animal in a pit. From Kansas City to the Carolinas, smaller cuts of meat are cooked slowly in woodfired ovens.

Regardless of the area, barbecuing is usually thought of as slow cooking, over a hardwood fire, in an enclosed area. But grilling is a broader term used to include uncovered outdoor cooking over wood or coals.

There are many different kinds of grills. Among the most popular is the hibachi, a small, low-priced oven that is portable and can be set up almost anywhere.

The kettle-type grills are the most popular kind of covered grills. The coals in this kind of grill sit about five inches away from the food and are not adjustable.

Smoking units are considered a variation, not a replacement for grilling. They are the closest replication of the barbecue pits of the Southwest and can cook large cuts of beef, venison and other wild game.

Electric and gas-fired grills go against the grain of hard-core grilling enthusiasts, but they are easy to start, and there are no ashes to clean up. They should still be cleaned occasionally, however.

Various instruments used in grilling include: an offset spatula, handy to turn meat on the grill; a pair of spring-loaded tongs, used to turn larger pieces of meat; skewers, used to hold small pieces of food together, are available in metal or wood; and a basting brush, used for oiling the grill before cooking and for applying sauces to food on the grill.

Charcoal was probably discovered when a burning log was inadvertently covered with sand or other debris, continued smoldering for a while and then went out. Whoever dug up the log and re-lit it discovered that it burned hotter, faster and with less smoke than regular wood.

Now charcoal is made by burning wood without oxygen. Once most of the oxygen is taken away, the wood (cellulose) is burned away leaving carbon (charcoal).

Several different kinds of lump charcoal are sold in the United States. The most common is mesquite but apple, oak, hickory or other woods are available in certain parts of the country.

Placement of coals in an uncovered grill will help meats cook more effectively. Instead of spreading coals out in an even layer, leave a portion of the coals bunched up together and spread the rest out evenly. This way, the grill has two different cooking temperatures, hot and hotter. Use the hottest area to sear the juices in, and the cooler area for continued cooking. If a piece of meat is getting done too quickly or not quickly enough, simply rearrange the meat accordingly.

For covered grills, the coals can be positioned directly under the food and cooked with the lid on, or the coals can be positioned to line the sides of the grill instead of directly under the food and cooking can continue with the lid on.

The entire bottom of the grill does not have to be covered unless food will be covering the entire area. Using too much coal can be a waste, so just position coals under the area that will be needed to cook on, adding a few extra just in case.

Generally the coals will take about 30-40 minutes before they are ready. If the coals have a slight gray ash covering them, that is another sign that they are ready.

Now that the meat is sizzling over the grill, the age old question of "when is it done?" needs to be answered. The easiest way is to take a peek inside by piercing food with a fork or skewer. Don't use a knife because it destroys the contours of the food and valuable juices are lost in the process.

For fish, the flesh should be opaque on the outside but slightly translucent at the very center.

Grill courtesy of Midwest Appliance and Hardware/Chef's clothing and utensils courtesy of Functions

For chicken, the juices from near the joints should run yellow with just a trace of pink when pierced with a fork or a skewer; meat near the bones should be opaque.

For steaks or chops, the center of the meat will show rare, medium rare or well done, to taste.

Sound and smell are two other senses to count on (sometimes) when cooking on a grill. If the food isn't making any noise, it is probably not cooking. The smell of cooked food is different from the smell of uncooked food. With some practice either listening or smelling can be used to determine if food is done, but these tests should be used with another test to be sure.

Steaks or chops can be tested by feel using a finger or fork. With some practice, the barbecuer can learn to determine doneness by placing pressure on the meat.

The usual determinant used in cooking is time, but with grilling, there are too many variables to make that possible, including the temperature, distance of grill from the fire and whether the grill is covered or uncovered.

There are many more techniques to grilling, but once started, the sky is the limit as far as what one can do with a grill, in any weather.

CURRIED BEEF KABOBS

1½ pounds sirloin (or other tender beef), trimmed of fat, cut into 11/4-inch cubes
1 small clove garlic, crushed
2 teaspoons curry powder
1 teaspoon turmeric
1/4 teaspoon ground cumin
3 tablespoons beer
8 medium mushroom caps, stems removed vegetable oil
1 large tart green apple, peeled, cored and cut into 8 wedges juice of ½ lemon

Pat the beef cubes dry and place in a medium bowl. In a small bowl, combine the garlic, curry powder, turmeric, cumin and beer. Add to the meat; toss thoroughly. Let stand covered 1 hour. Brush the mushroom caps with vegetable oil. Set aside. Sprinkle the apple wedges with lemon juice. Set aside. Preheat the grill.

Arrange the ingredients on the skewers in the following order: 1 mushroom cap (stem side up through the center of the cap), 1 beef cube, 1 apple wedge, 2 beef cubes, 1 apple wedge, 1 beef cube, and topped with another mushroom cap (stem side down). If using presoaked wood chips or chunks (chips for gas), or other flavorings, sprinkle them over the hot coals or lava rocks. Brush the grid lightly with oil.

Grill the kabobs over hot or high heat about 2 minutes per side for rare, 3 minutes for medium-rare. Serves 4.

CHOPS A L' ORANGE

½ cup orange juice
4 teaspoons honey
4 teaspoons vinegar
½ teaspoon finely slivered orange peel
4 pork chops, 1 inch thick
vegetable oil

Combine the orange juice, honey and vinegar in a small saucepan. Heat to boiling; reduce heat. Simmer until thick and syrupy, about 8 minutes. Stir in the orange peel.

Trim all but 1/4 to ½ inch fat from the edges of the pork chops. Slash remaining fat with a knife at 1-inch intervals. Brush the orange syrup over all sides of the chops. Let stand 1 hour. Preheat the grill.

If using presoaked wood chips, or other flavorings, sprinkle them over the hot coals or lava rocks. Brush the grid lightly with oil. Sear the chops over hot or high heat 1 minute per side, including edges. Cover and cook with vents open over medium-hot heat 8 minutes per side. Serves 4.

Recipes taken from "Cooking with Fire and Smoke" by Phillip Stephen Schulz.

DEVILED CHICKEN

½ cup olive oil juice of 1 lemon
2 tablespoons Dijon mustard
3 or 4 dashes Tabasco sauce
1 whole flattened chicken, or 3 to 4 pounds chicken parts

Combine all the ingredients except the chicken in large bowl. Let the mixture sit a few minutes to allow the flavors to combine. Taste and correct the seasoning. Rub the mixture over the chicken about 30 minutes before grilling.

Build a moderate fire in a covered or open grill. When the fire settles down to a glowing stage, start the chicken on the skin side. Turn after about 10 minutes and continue cooking from the bone side until the juices run yellow when the chicken is pierced with a fork or a skewer near the joints, about 25-35 minutes total cooking time. Baste frequently with the excess marinade while grilling. Serves 4.

CORN GRILLED IN ITS LEAVES

4 ears fresh sweet corn
1/4 cup butter, softened
Salt and pepper to taste
1 teaspoon ancho or New Mexico chili powder (optional)

Peel back the leaves of each ear of corn, but leave them attached at the base. Remove all of the corn silk. Combine the butter and seasonings and rub the mixture lightly all over the corn. Fold the leaves back up around the corn. Tie the tops of the leaves together with a string or a strip of one of the outside leaves.

Grill over a hot to moderate fire until the outer leaves are charred, 10 to 15 minutes. Guests should peel corn over plates, to catch any dripping butter. Pass any remaining chili butter. Serves 4.

Citizens discuss drainage difficulties

By RICHARD BROADFOOT
Collegian Reporter

The drainage problem brought on by recent rains received considerable attention at Tuesday's Manhattan City Commission meeting.

The commission held a public hearing to discuss the establishment of a benefit district to finance storm drainage improvements in the Manhattan Industrial Park, south of Sarber Lane and east of Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

Businesses in the area have complained that drainage problems there have increased following the construction of the Farmer's CO-OP at the southern tip of the industrial park, and that recent rains have compounded the problem.

The commission passed a resolution establishing the benefit district. The district will allow construction of a retention area and a diversion pipe to begin.

Other drainage complaints were expressed during the first reading of an ordinance to rezone 6.2 acres of land adjacent to Manhattan Country Club, 1531 N. 10th St.

The land, on which a 36-unit condominium complex is to be built, is already the source of some drainage problems.

Residents in the area expressed concerns that further construction may compound the problem by diverting water onto 10th Street.

A spokesman for the Manhattan Planning Board stated that designs to be implemented in the construction of the condominiums should not increase the drainage problems. He said that the design may, in fact, decrease the problem. Design considerations will include a higher curb for 10th Street and the construction of a retention dam.

The commission passed the first reading of the ordinance.

In other business, the commission named the week of May 3-9, 1987 as National Pet Week. Linda Schwenka, representing the Veterinary School Auxiliary, was on hand to accept the proclamation.

The commission also named May 6 as National Nurse's Day. Nancy Barnaby, representing the Kansas State Nurses Association, accepted the proclamation.

Meese under scrutiny by Justice Department

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Edwin Meese's involvement with scandal-plagued Wedtech Corp. is under review by the Justice Department's public integrity section and could result in a criminal investigation of the attorney general, it was disclosed Tuesday.

The public integrity section "is conducting a threshold inquiry...respecting Mr. Meese's relation to" Wedtech "and certain associates of the company," James McKay, an independent counsel, revealed in a letter to Congress. The corruption-probing unit delves into allegations of wrongdoing concerning federal, state and local officials.

The Justice Department initiated the review of Meese's activities in the past few weeks because "we thought it would be appropriate to take a look at it," said Terry Eastland, a department spokesman.

For the past three months, McKay has been investigating former White House aide Lyn Nofziger's lobbying activities on behalf of Wedtech, a Bronx firm that over the years has won $250 million in government business as a minority contractor.

McKay, who said he does not feel he currently has the mandate to expand his own criminal investigation to include Meese, disclosed that his office is sharing information with the public integrity section that may be pertinent to the Meese inquiry. His letter concluded:

"In the event that the court or the Department of Justice requests this office to assume responsibility for further investigation of allegations respecting Mr. Meese, we would be prepared to undertake that assignment."

McKay was responding to Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Rep. Peter Rodino, D-N.J., chairmen of the Senate and House judiciary committees, who said last week that Meese may have violated a federal conflict-of-interest law and suggested that McKay might expand his probe to cover the attorney general.

The attorney general failed to disqualify himself from two Justice Department criminal investigations of Wedtech until April 8. The public integrity section is trying to determine, among other things, whether the attorney general might have violated federal conflict-of-interest laws.

On April 6, Meese acknowledged that when he was White House counselor in 1982 he interceded on behalf of Wedtech.

Government negligent in man's death

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A judge ruled Tuesday that the government negligently caused and then covered up its role in the death of a mental patient given hallucinogenic drugs in secret Army experiments during the 1950s. She awarded the man's estate more than $700,000 damages.

In a sharply worded, 106-page opinion, U.S. District Judge Constance Baker Motley detailed what she called a 20-year "conspiracy" by the Army, the Justice Department and the New York state attorney general's office to conceal events surrounding the death of Harold Blauer.

Motley, awarding $702,044 to Blauer's estate, said he died "as a guinea pig in an experiment to test potential chemical warfare agents for the U.S. Army."

Blauer's daughter, Elizabeth Barrett, who filed the wrongful death lawsuit in 1976, eventually sought $11 million from the government.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Beth A.

Kaswan, who represented the government, said her office was reviewing the ruling and would have to consult Justice Department and Army officials in Washington before deciding whether to appeal.

Blauer, 42, a tennis pro, died Jan. 8, 1953, from one in a series of mescaline derivatives he was given at the New York State Psychiatric Institute, according to the ruling.

The drugs were administered to Blauer as part of a classified contract the state-run institute had with the Army Chemical Corps for evaluating the effects of potential chemical warfare agents.

Blauer was admitted voluntarily to the institute in December 1952 suffering from severe depression following a divorce. He later was diagnosed as a pseudo-neurotic schizophrenic, but was responding to therapy.

When Blauer's ex-wife, Amy, brought suit against the state, neither she nor her lawyers were told about the nature of the experiments or the Army's involvement.

Collegian investigation spurs shutdown of ticket company

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

A K-State student's unknowing purchase of a bogus airline ticket to India last summer has helped to shut down a national scam involving a San Diego ticket brokerage company.

The scheme stems from frequent flyer certificates — awards presented by airlines to travelers who have accumulated a certain number of miles. These awards are meant to be nontransferable, according to the airlines.

Instead of using them, however, many recipients sell their coupons to travel agents, who in turn resell the certificates as valid airline tickets to unsuspecting travelers.

Subbarao Venkatesh, graduate in computer science and a native of Bangalore, India, was one of those travelers.

Last July, he purchased what he thought was a bargain ticket for travel on Trans World Airlines from a travel agent in Virginia.

He flew to India, but in trying to return found that his ticket was invalid because it was a frequent flyer coupon issued in someone else's name.

Venkatesh was forced to purchase a one-way ticket back to the United States, which cost nearly as much as a round-trip ticket.

When he returned, Venkatesh found that the money for his ticket had gone to The Coupon Bank in San Diego, a company he had never heard of.

The Collegian became involved in the affair when it ran a story about Venkatesh.

Attorneys for TWA told the Collegian in November that companies like The Coupon Bank were causing millions of dollars of losses annually for American airline companies because the companies were selling frequent-flyer awards to customers who otherwise would have purchased a full-fare ticket. The airlines ended up flying the passengers for free, while the brokerage companies collected the fares.

Injunctions were filed Oct. 15, 1986, against The Coupon Bank, prohibiting the company from "issuing, selling or causing to be issued or sold tickets for travel" on American, United or Transworld airlines.

Upon investigation, the Collegian contacted The Coupon Bank in December and was told that TWA tickets could still be purchased. A staff writer proceeded to order a TWA ticket and received it late in December.

When the ticket was ordered over the telephone, the staff writer was instructed by a Coupon Bank employee not to tell anyone where the ticket had come from.

Once TWA learned that The Coupon Bank was still selling TWA tickets, a trial was scheduled in San Diego to determine if Eric S. Fuller, owner of the company, had violated the injunction. On Feb. 9, after testimony from the Collegian and one other witness who had experienced a similar incident, Fuller was found to be in contempt of court.

At a March 23 hearing, Fuller was ordered to pay $132,000 in damages to TWA after it was determined his company had sold tickets for travel on the airline.

After that, the airlines began banding together in an effort to put Fuller's companies out of business.

An April 27 hearing may have done just that.

The hearing involved similar incidents in which Fuller sold tickets for travel on United and American airlines as well — a direct violation of the injunction.

The litigation was between United and American airlines, TWA, the Airline Reporting Commission and Fuller's companies.

As a result of the hearing, U.S. District Court Judge Howard B. Turrentine forbid Fuller and The Coupon Bank from soliciting, purchasing, selling or brokering American, United or TWA airline mileage awards or certificates. He also forbid the Coupon Bank from issuing any tickets for travel on the airlines.

In addition, Fuller agreed he would no longer be involved in coupon brokering.

"Basically, they're out of business," said TWA attorney James M. Derr, Los Angeles. "American, United and TWA are the three largest airlines with respect to frequent flyer programs."

Area banks offer incentives for senior citizen accounts

By The Collegian Staff

Manhattan banks are joining others around the country in providing special incentives for people 60 and older.

National senior citizens' accounts vary, but usually offer checking accounts with interest payments and/or personalized checks.

Many incentive plans also provide free traveler's checks, discounts or rebates on airline tickets, lodging and car rentals, credit card protection, financial information seminars, social activities such as dances and trips to museums, professional sports events and recreational activities.

In Manhattan, most banks offer checking accounts with interest and no service charges, and some banks offer free travelers and cashier checks for their older patrons.

Citizens Bank and Trust Co., 6th Street and Humboldt Street, offers customers 60 or older interest checking with no service charges and no minimum balances, as well as free travelers and cashier checks.

Union National Bank and Trust Co., 727 Poyntz Ave., offers a Plan 65 checking account giving free checking to patrons over 65 years of age.

The Kansas State Bank, 1010 Westloop, offers a New Horizons club for customers 60 and over. This club includes interest checking accounts and also provides seminars on current issues such as estate planning to keep its customers informed, said Marie Dellen, the bank's New Horizons club adviser.

Other services provided to the members of the club include group picnics, parties and trips to the Kansas City Royals baseball games, as well as other trips across the state.

In Kansas, residents 55 and older make up 23 percent of the total population — 568,225 of the 2,470,500 residents, according to a Sales and Marketing Management survey.

These customers control about 80 percent of all bank deposits in the state. They tend to keep high account balances and have the highest discretionary income per capita of any market segment.

U.S. helps Guatemala with rebels

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Three U.S. Army helicopters and their crews were sent to Guatemala earlier this week to airlift Guatemalan soldiers into the country's interior for a counter-insurgency operation, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

Responding to queries from reporters, the Pentagon said the operation began on Sunday and ended Monday after the choppers had transported about 300 soldiers from Guatemala City to the town of Playa Grande, about 120 miles to the north.

"The operation was mounted in response to an official request from the Guatemalan president to the U.S. ambassador," said Col. Marvin Braman, a Pentagon spokesman.

The U.S. ambassador is Alberto Martinez Piedra.

"This is an isolated area that has become the scene of increased hostile guerrilla activity of late and the government there has few assets to transport its soldiers. We were asked to fly a one-way transport mission and an assessment was made that the risk to U.S. forces was minimal."

Braman said the mission was flown by three CH-47 Chinook helicopters that were dispatched from the Palmerola air base in neighboring Honduras, where the United States maintains a military headquarters to oversee exercises.

Graduate students receive awards

Two graduate students in the Division of Biology have been recognized for their contributions in the areas of research and scientific presentations.

Those receiving awards were Sharon Doll, graduate student in biology, and Ali Fattaey, senior in biology.

Both students were given awards at the annual meeting of the Missouri Valley branch of the American Society for Microbiology held in Manhattan April 24.

Doll received the Cora M. Downs Award for Advanced Graduate Research for research on persistent viral infections of the central nervous system. Fattaey received the Cora M. Downs Award for Beginning Graduate Studies for work on the role of viral proteins in the maturation of tumor viruses.

MCC senior honored by magazine

Mari Thompson, senior at Manhattan Christian College, has been selected by Good Housekeeping magazine as one of the 100 Women of Exceptional Promise in the graduating class of 1987.

The selections were made from about 3,200 nominations from colleges and universities across the nation.

Applicants were judged on notable campus and community activities and outstanding personal endeavor as well as grade point average.

Good Housekeeping is presenting these awards in celebration of the 200th anniversary of the Constitution.

Memorial design contest to begin

Entry forms for the K-State Vietnam Memorial Design Contest will be available starting this Friday. The design contest is open to students, faculty, staff and alumni.

The deadline for entry is July 31, and the winning designer will receive $200, said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services and member of the Vietnam Memorial Committee.

"We are beginning the contest now so that contestants can design an appropriate memorial over the summer when most students, faculty and staff will not have to be as concerned about schoolwork," said Gary Haulmark, sophomore in political science and chairman of the committee.

Forms can be picked up at the Military Science Hall, College of Architecture, Department of Architectural Engineering and Student Governing Association Office in the Union.

Professor tries rose-making techniques

By The Collegian Staff

New techniques in genetic engineering are making plant reproduction easier and less time consuming than the old methods of grafting and cutting, says a K-State horticulture professor.

Houchang Khatamian, associate professor of horticulture, grows mini-roses by means of micropropagation — taking a vegetative bud of a desired plant and putting it in a test tube containing shoot multiplying medium.

Khatamian is currently experimenting with calluses that are grown on the ends of vegetative buds. If successful in his research, Khatamian hopes to create new varieties of roses with the callus.

The process of micropropagation involves clipping a leaf at the stem attachment joint and placing it in a medium specially mixed for the clipping to grow as many shoots as possible, Khatamian said.

The medium — Murashige and Skoog Medium — is a mixture of macro and micro nutrients, as well as certain growth regulators which cause the plant to grow shoots or roots, Khatamian said.

After the plant clippings grow to become tiny plantlets, they are either clipped again and put back into the shooting medium, or they are put into the rooting medium, he said.

When the plants are mature enough to be potted, they are put into a greenhouse-soil mixture for several weeks to accustom them to the natural environment.

"Plants that are grown this way are more sensitive than other plants and must be gradually put into nature," he said.

The micropropagation process is beneficial for several reasons, Khatamian said.

Advantages of the method include: less needed growing time, more economic efficiency than previous means of production, improved plant quality, uniformity in the offspring, a year-round growing season, disease-free plants and a possibility of creating new varieties through genetic engineering.

Riot-prevention planning moves ahead

By STEVE LAWRENCE
Collegian Reporter

The Nov. 7 K-State-University of Kansas football rivalry will not be followed by a disturbance like the one after last year's game if the Aggieville Merchants' Association implements 14 points to keep order in the Aggieville area, said Bill Jacoby, executive director of the association.

"It will be a normal day in Aggieville," said Jacoby. "The only difference is you won't be able to drive through the core area, you'll have to park and walk."

The core area of Aggieville has been designated by boundaries on the north, south, east and west sides of Aggieville.

The west boundary runs from Varney's Book Store, 623 N. Manhattan Ave., to the Campus Theatre, 615 N. Manhattan Ave., and the east boundary is designated by an imaginary line from the alley alongside Speed Wash Laundry, 1118 Moro St., to the door of The Pathfinder, 1111

Moro St.

On the north side, the core area begins at about Pyramid Pizza, 707 N. 12th St., to a line that stretches from Aggieville Barber & Style Shop, 613 N. 12th St., to the Dusty Bookshelf, 612 N. 12th St.

While the core area will be blocked off to vehicular traffic, pedestrians will be allowed in the core area after passing through a gate.

According to the recommendations, the "gate" will be staffed by at least one Riley County Police Department officer and one professional security officer who will be checking to make sure no one enters the core area with a beverage container of any kind.

The reason for the no-container rule is to eliminate objects that could be thrown, Jacoby said.

Although containers won't be allowed in, the dangers of people climbing on roof tops and throwing things still needs to be addressed, Jacoby said.

"The problems tended to start with people throwing things from roofs," he said.

In order to prevent this from occurring again, the Aggieville Merchants' Association has requested that RCPD officers be stationed on the roofs in the core area and be allowed to escort away anyone who climbs on top of the buildings.

"If you leave (roof tops) unguarded, you're going to have people up there," Jacoby said.

Currently, in order for police to arrest someone for being on a roof, the property owner of the building must notify the authorities, he said. Then all the person has to do is step onto another roof, and the owner of that building has to notify the police.

"The city has already taken steps to put the roof ordinance into effect," Jacoby said.

Another consideration as to what time of day the game will be played might not be decided until possibly a week before the game because television coverage won't be decided before that time, he said.

DRYING OUT

DRINKING MYTHS

The "drunk tank" is a good cure for alcoholism.

You have to drink in the morning or drink by yourself to be an alcoholic.

You are not an alcoholic unless you drink at least a pint a day.

Alcohol is not a drug.

By TIM STALEY
Collegian Reporter

For some people, drinking alcohol is not a problem. For others, it is like drinking poison.

A K-State freshman is one of those people who cannot drink alcohol. To protect his identity, he will be called Tom in this story.

Tom is an alcoholic.

For Tom, and other alcoholics, drinking alcohol has become uncontrollable. For those who, like Tom, choose to join the Alcoholics Anonymous program, the first step is admitting "we were powerless over alcohol, that our lives had become unmanageable."

Tom admits that his life had become unmanageable.

He said he never drank alcohol in high school, but when he came to K-State he started "partying" around the dorms. Then last spring, he and his girlfriend, to whom Tom had been engaged for three weeks, broke up. Other important relationships with family and friends also ended because of his drinking problem.

"I didn't have any relationships; no friends at all. Everybody excluded me from everything," Tom said. "I knew I was screwing up somewhere, and I had to get my friends back or I was just going to be a total loner the rest of my life."

"It was really surprising to see how things started working out once I started going to AA."

His first step was to go to a counselor at the Counseling Center in Holton Hall. The counselor told him she wasn't going to be able to help him unless he did something about his alcohol problem.

"Later that day, I went to an AA meeting, and I continued to go to AA meetings for about a month," but then, "things got bad."

Tom wasn't understanding the program, and he was experiencing "dry drunks." A dry drunk is a heavy state of depression that causes the same symptoms as drunkenness.

Tom would stutter when he spoke, get dizzy when he stood up, and the slightest mishap would set him off and put him in a bad mood although he had no alcohol in his system.

"There were a couple of times I'd be stumbling around my room, and I didn't know where I was at," he said.

After talking with a friend's wife who had gone to Valley Hope, Tom said, "something snapped in my head: I want to go to treatment. I want to go to Valley Hope and see if I can't understand this better."

Valley Hope is an in-patient treatment facility that has a 30-45 day, in-house living program to rehabilitate alcoholics by removing the chemical and re-teaching the person how to live, said Beth Hughes, substance abuse education specialist and alcohol and drug therapist.

Tom has been out of treatment for almost two weeks now, and he is still sober.

"Today is 76, so tomorrow will be 77 (days sober)," Tom said.

"One day at a time. That's all it is," he said. "I don't worry about things coming up as much as I used to. I'm still going, and I'm still dry today."

But Hughes said the battle is not won merely because a person has stopped drinking.

"The tricky thing about the disease is that the easy

During the last 10 years, 250,000 Americans died in alcohol-related traffic accidents. There are 25,000 deaths each year; 500 every week; 71 every day; one every 20 minutes. — U.S. Department of Transportation.

At this rate, it would take one school year to kill off the entire student body of full-time students at K-State.

part is removing the chemical," she said. "The hard part is recovery."

She said there are people who stop drinking whose personalities don't change. They don't recover emotionally, they just stop drinking.

"I think that's really sad," she said.

She said often people drink because the payoff to not drink is not as great a reward as the payoff to drink.

"I really believe there will not be successful recovery until the payoff for not drinking is as great," she said.

Tom has reached that point. His favorite slogan is, "My worst day sober is better than my best day drunk."

"I like that slogan a lot because it reminds me of a lot of things. I may be down, but it's like, 'Hey, this is a heck of a lot better than being drunk.'"

Although Tom's recovery might paint a rosy picture, the alcoholic's struggle to overcome the disease is ongoing.

"The worst part of being an alcoholic is that everywhere you go there is alcohol," Tom said.

Since his return to school, a lot of drinking has gone on around the dorm he lives in and "every now and then I want (alcohol) real bad."

"I'm like, 'Do I take it and start my sobriety date all over again, or just stay away from it and go on?'" he said.

Tom sometimes changes his plans so he won't be around alcohol and can avoid the temptation of drinking.

"That's what I hate about it the most," he said. "In a sense I feel like I'm gypped because I can't drink at all. Period. I've been through denials now and then. 'Why can't I drink like everyone else?'"

"But in a way, it's almost like I'm the chosen one, to go and teach and spread the word. I'm not able to drink, but look at all the people I can help. I enjoy helping people."

"That's why I like to go to AA meetings, because everybody gets to talk, and maybe I can help somebody else because someone is helping me," he said.

"Anybody who thinks they have a (drinking) problem (shouldn't) hesitate about trying to find some help. There is help all over, all they have to do is open up the phone book and look under AA."

'Phenomenal' rise in alcoholism alarming, therapist says

By TIM STALEY
Collegian Reporter

Alcohol is a drug, and alcoholics are addicted to the drug. The disease they have is alcoholism, and it ranks among the major national health threats, along with cancer, mental illness and heart disease, says the National Council on Alcoholism.

Beth Hughes, substance abuse education specialist and alcohol and drug therapist, said she is alarmed with the high percentage of alcoholics in the United States. She said that 10 years ago one out of 10 Americans were alcoholics, and today it is closer to one out of eight.

"That is phenomenal," she said.

Hughes works with repeat law-offenders who use alcohol and with community education on alcohol and alcohol problems for Pawnee Mental Services in Manhattan and Junction City.

When she is working with law-offenders who use alcohol, she looks for loss of control, blackouts and the payoff to the person drinking to diagnose the alcoholism.

"What I mean by (loss of control) is, can a person predict, every single time they drink what's going to happen when they drink or how much they are going to drink?" she said. "Can a person sit down and have three drinks every time they drink and never get drunk and never go over that unless they intentionally have a fourth or fifth one?"

She said there a lot of people who never intend to get drunk and end up "blitzed."

"That's a symptom of the disease of alcoholism," Hughes said.

Another symptom she looks for is the occurrence of blackouts.

"Some people can have a blackout the first time they really tie one on big time," she said. "A blackout is a really serious indicator, a body indicator of practically an (overdose)."

She said she also looks at the payoff to the person drinking. The more important drinking is to them, the more likely there is a disease of alcoholism.

"I did an interview the other day with a man who is 48 who has diabetes and high blood pressure and continues to drink," she said. "That tells me he's not just a social drinker. Drinking is very important to him."

Hughes said it doesn't really matter when someone drinks or how much they drink. It matters what happens when they drink.

"There can be a binge drinker who only drinks once a year who can be as alcoholic as a person who drinks a case (of beer) a day," she said. "I did an evaluation on a lady who didn't drink but three times last year. She got a DUI twice."

"When a person keeps getting in trouble using the chemical they are either ignorant as the day is long, or they are alcoholic," she said. "I tend to believe they are alcoholic."

Hughes said that this is one of the common myths about alcoholics, that a person has to drink a lot to be one.

"There are lots of ways to drink, and there are lots of ways of being an alcoholic," she said.

Alcohol is a social drug, and there is nothing wrong with wanting a drink while mowing the lawn, she said.

"But when a person has two DUIs, is it because they are just too stupid to understand the law, or is it because there is a disease in progress that they get drunk when they don't intend to?" she said.

For those people who do have a disease in progress, Hughes suggests Alcoholics Anonymous. She said AA has a 12-step program based on a philosophy of learning how to live without chemicals.

"AA is the most effective treatment in the world," she said. "I personally would not send anyone anywhere that did not have an AA 12-step philosophy program."

"AA will not say it is for everyone, and I believe that. I'm not saying everyone must go to AA. I just know that for those who do go, it is the most effective treatment in the world," she said.

"I believe with all my might that a recovery program like A.A. can give them a reason they can be glad they are alive. A reason to celebrate being sober," she said.

"Alcoholism is a roller coaster. Up and down. Up and down. And when it can even out with life balanced, that's what sobriety is all about," she said. "Being sober is being glad you are alive."

Hughes said some of the unsung victims of alcoholism are the children of alcoholics. A lot of children are not getting the attention they need, she said.

Hughes, whose father was an alcoholic, said she hated for children to have to live with alcoholism without understanding it.

"I spent 30 years of my energy trying to control my family situation," she said. "It was the greatest release I have ever had in my life when I realized I can't cause alcoholism, and I could let go."

She said children need to realize the "three C's" of being children of alcoholics.

"You can't cause alcoholism. You can't control it. You can't cure it," she said. "I began my program in recovery 10 years after my alcoholic died. You don't have to be living with the alcoholic; he or she doesn't even have to be alive for you to start a recovery program."

"I think there are a lot of adult children of alcoholics at K-State that are still suffering terribly from the effects of the disease," she said. "I was 30 years old before I knew it was a disease. I didn't buy it."

"I thought, 'Isn't that convenient to call it a disease?' I believe it now, because I have lived it," she said. "I have seen the emotional devastation even when the chemical is gone. Convincing people of that is almost impossible, but I've seen it. I have seen it, so I'm a believer."

Balanced tracksters aim for twin titles at Big Eight's meet

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Balance and experience among K-State's track teams in most events have left Coach John Capriotti optimistic of dual victories in the Big Eight Conference outdoor track championships May 15-16 in Lawrence.

"(Right now) Nebraska's men and women are head and shoulders above everybody else," Capriotti said. "If we can't beat them, I can't see anybody else beating them. We think we can give them a run on both sides."

K-State's track squads will not participate in other track meets before the Big Eight championships. But some individuals are entered in meets this weekend to try qualifying for the NCAA outdoor championships June 3-6 in Baton Rouge, La.

Kenny Harrison, who has already qualified, will compete in the Modesto (Calif.) Invitational, which features many of the country's best track athletes. At Modesto, Harrison — who also long jumps — will compete in the triple jump.

A near shoe-in for top Big Eight honors in the women's discus and shot put is Pinkie Suggs. Felicia Carpenter is expected to engage in a duel for a gold in the triple jump with Nebraska's Renita Robinson. Jacques Struckhoff, Capriotti said, is the class of the distance runners at the meet, while Kim Kilpatrick in the hurdles and Joy Jones, Anita Isom and Karen Brown in the sprints are all expected to present problems for their competitors.

Harrison will likely lead the men's track team in the triple jump and the long jump. He will also compete on the 1,600-meter relay team that Capriotti said has "a shot to win" as well.

Two other members of the mile relay team, Jeff Reynolds and Sean Banks, are favorites in the 400-meter dash. John Williams in the short sprints, Dan O'Mara in the shot put and discus, and Aaron Roberson in the 400-meter hurdles can all be expected to present threats in their events, Capriotti said. Ron Stahl will lead the distance attack for K-State as a favorite in the 10,000-meter run.

Review of athletics as simple as A-B-C

Classes are almost completed for the semester and, by the same token, the year in sports at K-State is coming to a close.

Is reviewing the year in sports a difficult task? No, it's as simple as A-B-C:

A for academics. It's nice to read that several of K-State's coaches stress the academic importance to student athletes.

B as in Big Eight Conference. Besides its football reputation, it's steadily building its might in other areas as well.

Congratulations go to volleyball player Shawnee Call, one of 30 players recently selected to try out for the 12-member United States' team which will compete in the World University Games.

D as in drug testing. Even though there are problems with the length of its banned-drug list and testing methods, the NCAA made the right move to combat the illness of drug abuse among athletes. Now if ruling bodies for professional-level sports would take the same steps, we wouldn't have to read tragic obituaries such as Len Bias or Don Rogers.

Exciting could describe the "Midnight Madness" practice the men's basketball team had the beginning of the season. The excitement carried over and saw students camping out for season tickets again this year.

F for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum. It gets a lot of mention in this area's media. One more time couldn't hurt.

Good things to come. With the addition of new coaches and new attitudes on teams, I guess you could say "the future's so bright, I've gotta wear shades."

H stands for Ward Haylett, K-State's "No. 1 fan." At 91, he continues to be a staunch supporter of Wildcat athletics.

I for information, as in the sports information office. The people who work over there provide a valuable, yet largely unrecognized, service. Thanks for your help this year.

J stands for junior college transfer. Kruger realized the immediate impact a juco product can have on a team, and fans will probably see more of the same next fall at KSU Stadium.

K for K-State. What else? Lon Kruger returned to his alma mater and guided the men's basketball team back on the road to success. Why he didn't get Big Eight coach of the year is beyond me.

M stands for Steve Miller. K-State

K-State pitcher/outfielder Mike Hinkle, whose season was described as "tremendous" by head coach Mike Clark, leads the team with 65 hits, and his

.378 batting average ranks second on the squad. The Wildcats end their season this weekend against the University of Nebraska.

Baseball squad ending season

By JENNIFER CHAULK
Sports Writer

The final curtain will come down this week on K-State's 1987 baseball team.

K-State, 25-23 overall and 6-11 in Big Eight Conference play, is scheduled to play The Wichita State University Shockers at 7 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

This weekend K-State will take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers, currently in third place in the Big Eight, in home double-headers. Action will get under way noon Saturday at Frank Myers Field, and Sunday's twin-bill will start at 12:30 p.m.

Even though tonight's game is a make-up — the Wildcats were originally scheduled to play the Shockers April 14 but were rained out — it is likely rain could cancel this one.

"I hope we can play," K-State Coach Mike Clark said. "It doesn't look good, but if we can get some sun, we should be able to go."

Wichita State, 48-17 overall, defeated Creighton University in three out of four games in Wichita last weekend. K-State beat Creighton earlier this season in Manhattan, 8-6.

A more telling comparison of the Shockers and K-State, however, is the results of last week's match-ups between the teams in Wichita — April 28, WSU beat the Wildcats 3-2 in extra innings; April 29, WSU won 11-7.

Clark is not daunted by these losses.

"We're playing good ball right now," he said. "We played well against (WSU) last week, so I'm very encouraged." Clark said Paul Iseman, 4-4, will get the starting nod against Wichita State.

Nebraska, 35-16 overall and 11-5 in conference play, is ranked 21st in the ESPN/Collegiate Baseball poll. Clark said the games will be tough ones for K-State.

"(Nebraska will) be hungry," he said. "Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and Nebraska are all together at the top, so we'll kind of get to play the spoiler role."

Clark said Nebraska's strengths are scoring runs, good pitching depth and a good running game. He also pinpointed what a win over the Cornhuskers could do for the future of K-State's baseball program.

"NU is one of the teams we have to overcome to break up into the top three or four teams in the Big Eight in the next couple of years," he said.

The Big Eight Conference's baseball tournament will be May 13-17 at the All Sports Stadium in Oklahoma City. K-State, sixth in the conference, will not participate in the tournament since only the top four teams are invited. Those spots have been locked out by Oklahoma State, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Missouri.

Clark thinks had it not been for injuries, it would have been highly possible for K-State to be one of the top four teams.

"Looking back," he said, "I think if we'd have had (pitchers) Darryl Rowley, Rocky (Ferguson) and Jeff (Peterson), we'd have been in the thick of things. It's disappointing, but despite the adversity, we've had a great year."

Clark still thinks the Wildcats have an "excellent shot to get a .500 record" — a goal he set at the beginning of the season.

As for a review of this season's performances, Clark said he has been pleased with all of his players, but singled out pitcher Zack Kimbrell and pitcher/outfielder Mike Hinkle.

"Zack's emergence as a pitcher really fulfilled his role for the team," he said. "He stepped forward when we needed him. And Mike has been tremendous."

Clark also said his 11 seniors have given good leadership to the team.

"I am very pleased with the seniors," he said. "I think they feel like they've set a good foundation for our program. Our staff has done a good job of getting the most out of these kids. We've come a long way in six or seven months."

NOTES: Clark's preliminary pick to win the Big Eight tournament is Oklahoma State. He said he reserves absolute judgment until he sees Nebraska. Clark said OSU's hitting lineup is "second to none"...Through 48 games, Jeff Tuttle leads the Wildcats in hitting with a .389 average. Hinkle is batting .378 and Otto Kaifes has a .339 average.

Major-league dreams turn into coaching career

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

Some years ago, a father told his son the easiest way to break into major-league baseball was to become a catcher. So the boy, filled with big-league aspirations, became a catcher.

But the boy discovered in college that a shot at the majors just wasn't to be. So he chose to become a coach — a decision he doesn't regret.

He is Mike Keenan, one of K-State's three graduate assistants for the baseball team who joined the program last fall. He helps assistant coach Jeff Stewart with hitting instruction and works with catchers on throwing and fielding mechanics.

"A lot of people don't want to be catchers," Keenan said. "My father is the Midwest supervisor of scouting for the Los Angeles Dodgers and he told me when I was young that the fastest way to the big leagues was to become a good catcher. I decided to catch because I wanted to play pro ball, but as it turned out my abilities didn't match my desire."

This isn't Keenan's first taste of coaching. Being a former assistant at Pratt Community College and Fort Hays State, he has just about seen it all.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

"I wouldn't say I've done it all before, but I've done a little bit of everything," Keenan said. "So there's not a lot that's new to me, but I'm still learning as I go along."

Keenan, a native Kansan, played college baseball for two years at Barton Community College and two years at Bethany College before deciding to coach.

He said coaching differs greatly from being a player.

"Coaching and playing are two different things," Keenan said. "Coaching is trying to get the best out of each player. The 'best' way to do it where I've played before may not be the best way, so that could be a disadvantage, but I try to find the best ways for kids to do things and have them do it that way."

Even though Keenan said coaching styles he has come into contact with are all different, there is one thing that is the same — being an aggressive team.

"All the places I've been have been aggressive teams," Keenan said. "I guess the style of play is the most important thing. You can either be a running team and be aggressive, or you can be a team like the Baltimore Orioles when Earl Weaver managed there. He had the philosophy of a three-run homer as opposed to stealing and bunting. We've tried to be aggressive here when we've had the chance to run and stuff."

Concentrating on hitting instruction and working with the catchers is Keenan's job in helping the Wildcats be an aggressive team.

"The most important thing about hitting is to see the ball," he said. "You can't hit the ball if you don't see it. There's certain mechanics we try to teach, but if you don't see the ball as long as possible, you aren't going to hit the ball well."

Hitting may be the "glory" part of baseball, but the catcher behind the plate is an integral part of the team and requires special coaching as well.

"I think the big thing we've had here is trying to get the catchers to relax behind the plate," Keenan said.

Kansas' coach ponders move to NY Knicks

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Kansas basketball coach Larry Brown says he will take himself out of the running for the New York Knicks coaching job if he doesn't receive a firm offer from the NBA team by Friday.

Brown told the New York Daily News that he set the deadline because he wants to be fair with Kansas star Danny Manning, who must decide by Friday whether to play his senior year in college or turn pro.

"The situation with Danny Manning and his father (Kansas assistant coach Ed Manning) is that they have to know by midnight of May 8, hopefully sooner," Brown said Monday. "They want to go where I go, and I have to be up front with them like I've been all along."

Manning reportedly wants to play another year at Kansas, but that could change if Brown decides to leave. Friday is the deadline for college underclassmen to declare themselves eligible for the NBA draft in June.

The Daily News and New York Times reported Tuesday that Brown met last Wednesday with Knicks President Richard Evans to discuss the coaching job. Evans fired Coach Bob Hill and General Manager Scotty Sterling two weeks ago.

Brown, in an interview from Lawrence, Kan., said other NBA teams, including the Phoenix Suns, had contacted him about coaching vacancies but he said he is interested only in the Knicks' job.

Briefly In Sports

Renfro to head scholarship fund

Craig Renfro, who has served as a field representative for development the past two years for K-State's athletic department, has been named director of the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund.

Renfro, 27, will coordinate fund-raising efforts for the fund, which generates money for K-State's 14-sport intercollegiate athletic program. He will also coordinate activities for the numerous Catbacker and Wildcat clubs in Kansas.

K-State to host rodeo this weekend

K-State's rodeo club will host a 20-team rodeo Friday through Sunday at CiCo Park in Manhattan. Action gets under way at 7:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday, and at 1:30 p.m. Sunday.

Advance tickets are available in the Student Union until Wednesday and cost $3 for adults and $2 for children. Other ticket outlets include S Bar J Western Clothiers, all Manhattan Pizza Hut locations and the Farmer's Co-op.

Tickets at the gate will run $4 for adults and $3 for children each day. Two- and four-year college teams from Kansas and Oklahoma are entered.

NBA standouts enter Hall of Fame

Walt Frazier and Pete Maravich, two of the NBA's flashy guards of the 1970s, are among five former players who were inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame.

The others are high-scoring forward Rick Barry, who played in the NBA with the San Francisco and Golden State Warriors and Houston Rockets, Bobby Wanzer and Bob Houbregs.

Their election, announced last February, brings the membership in the game's shrine to 161, including 71 players. It is the first time in the Hall of Fame's 29-year history that no coach, contributor, referee or team was elected.

Men's golf team to end '87 season

The K-State men's golf team will end the 1987 campaign May 18-19 at the Big Eight Conference tournament at Prairie Dunes Country Club in Hutchinson.

The five golfers going from K-State are Jeff Sedoreck, Daran Neuschafer, Todd Fowler, John Shields and Troy Keller.

Rugby squad finishes season at 8-3

K-State's rugby squad finished off its spring season recently, winning four of its last five games to compile an 8-3 record.

Among victories for the Wildcats were two of three wins at the 1987 Western Regional Collegiate Rugby Championships. The team earned the right to compete in the tournament by winning the championship of the Heart of America Rugby Football Union, with a victory over the University of Kansas collegiate squad last fall.

The third-place finish in the regional championship ranked the 'Cats among the 12 best rugby teams in the nation.

Toronto bans smoking at stadiums

The Toronto City Council voted to ban smoking at all sports stadiums.

Fans will not be allowed to smoke at Exhibition Stadium where baseball's Blue Jays and the Argonauts of the Canadian Football League play, and at the new domed stadium when it is built.

Ripken wins AL's weekly award

Baltimore's Cal Ripken, who hit .400 with eight extra-base hits last week, was named the American League's Player of the Week.

Ripken had four doubles, a triple and three home runs, good for six runs batted in to beat out Jim Presley of Seattle. Presley had four homers and 11 RBI.

Q is for question mark. Since the athletic fee didn't pass, unfortunately, the future of K-State's non-revenue sports will be associated with these facing drastic budget cuts.

ASK works for passage of student policies

By TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

The Associated Students of Kansas lobbies for university students' interests at the state level in the same manner student government influences university policy-making, said Mark Tallman, legislative director for ASK.

Although state budget cuts have hampered the success of some legislation, ASK has had a successful year lobbying for student programs, Tallman said.

ASK's power comes from its representation of several universities called member-universities. The organization's representatives take a stand on legislation dealing directly with student concerns, he said.

In addition to K-State, ASK members include Emporia State University, Fort Hays State University, Pittsburg State University, the University of Kansas and the Wichita State University. About 70,000 students are enrolled in the six universities.

The main governing body of ASK is the Legislative Assembly, a legislative body comprising student representatives from the member institutions. Each LA delegate represents 1,000 students from his school, making total assembly membership about 70 students.

During the fall assembly, members establish the general legislative platform, while at the spring meeting they decide what issues ASK should research during the summer to prepare for the Legislature's fall term.

ASK's projected budget for fiscal 1986-87 was about $78,000, but Washburn University's resignation from ASK last fall reduced the budget to about $70,000.

Washburn withdrew because it is not a state-funded institution, Tallman said. Some ASK members do not want Washburn to come under the Kansas Board of Regents' jurisdiction, he said.

Because Washburn is not a state institution, many of its biggest concerns within the Legislature are different than those being supported by ASK, Tallman said.

ASK-member schools currently pay 50 cents per student per semester to belong to ASK. K-State paid about $15,000 for two semesters. ASK is proposing a 10-cent-per-student increase, raising ASK's budget for fiscal 1987-88 to an estimated $84,000.

During final allocations in the fall, Student Senate pays K-State's ASK membership fee based on final fall enrollment figures and an estimate of spring enrollment, said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities.

STUDENT CONCERN

During an April 23 Student Senate meeting, some senators contended K-State's money could be better spent hiring its own lobbyist for the Legislature, but Tallman said he believes ASK has and will continue to benefit all member schools.

"Very few issues that ASK deals with affect only K-State," he said.

Tallman believes it would be appropriate for those concerned about whether or not ASK-member schools benefit enough from ASK to study alternative methods of representation.

Kirk Caraway, senior in political science, said he is concerned that K-State might be able to better lobby with the Legislature with its own lobbyist.

"We might be able to do it better ourselves if we get our own lobbyist who represents K-State and not KU and the other schools (in the Regents system)," he said.

For now, he said the State and Community Affairs Committee in Student Senate will "look into what ASK does and if we could get that service for a better price."

Lori Shellenberger, junior in political science and chairwoman of the committee, said next fall her committee will examine the advantages and disadvantages of ASK.

"We will look at peer institutions and at universities who have their own lobbyists," she said.

She said she personally supports the efforts of ASK.

"I think (our lobbying) is more effective when students lobby together," Shellenberger said.

If K-State left ASK and hired its own lobbyist, the University would lose its advantage because of a reduced number of students represented, Tallman said.

"The organization is far larger than any single campus enrollment," he said, adding that ASK covers an area consisting of at least six communities and legislators.

Tallman said ASK does more than what most lobbyists would do for K-State. ASK representatives attend all Regents meetings and council meetings. ASK also researches enrollment, tuitions and other topics pertinent to legislation affecting ASK-member schools, he said.

ASK works closely with the Regents' staff, but does not take an active part in the meetings, Tallman said.

If all the universities in ASK had their own lobbyists, Tallman said, they would often work for similar legislation and would each be spending money on these efforts. The schools would soon realize they should combine their efforts.

"And that is what we have done," Tallman said.

"K-State students could pull out of ASK, but you can't pull out of the state university system," he said.

"ASK is to state government what student government is to university policy." The Regents deal with topics such as faculty salaries, not student access standards at universities. Therefore, it is important that students are represented by someone, Tallman said.

REGENTS RESPONSIBILITY

ASK works for the students, while the Board of Regents represents other facets of education, Tallman said.

There is a need for student input, and that is why students have student government, he said. If students trusted the administration to keep their concerns in mind at all times, student government would not be necessary, he said.

In the same manner, if students trust the Regents to keep student concerns in the forefront, ASK is not necessary, he said.

"The Board of Regents represents the givers of education," Tallman said. "ASK represents the consumers of education."

"One of the best reasons for being in ASK is that should a major issue of student concern arise, the mechanics are in place to effectively organize the students and their concerns and professionally present them where they have the biggest impact on the final decision," said former Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics.

"(ASK lobbyists) do a good job documenting the bills they work on and their outcomes," Johnson said, but it is impossible to determine exactly what they have accomplished.

ASK's presence may indirectly influence some bills for which it does not lobby, and it may lobby heavily on an issue that already had a good chance of passing, he said.

One example of what ASK has accomplished is the Legislature's allocation of $20,000 for a college information brochure, a publication giving information about Kansas schools for students seeking higher education, Tallman said.

"I was, frankly, very surprised on how much success we've had," Tallman said, referring to the $20,000.

The Legislature requested ASK, originator of the funding request, to submit a proposal concerning the money's use, he said.

While members of ASK may be able to agree on a general stance, sometimes reaching a consensus is not possible.

"ASK does its best to come up with a policy that everyone in the association can support, however, we can't do that all of the time," he said.

1986-87 ISSUES

By SUSAN D. BAIRD
Campus Editor

The following is a list of some of the issues with which Associated Students of Kansas has dealt during the past two years and the evaluation by Mark Tallman, ASK legislative director, and Christine Graves, ASK executive director, of ASK's success or failure.

1986-87 LEGISLATIVE YEAR

— Release of fees: ASK supported the Kansas Board of Regents' position advocating release of excess student fees for use by individual universities, and the Legislature released 75 percent of fees from the state treasury. VICTORY.

— University funding formula: The Legislature adopted ASK's suggestion of widening the funding corridor so a school with a projected enrollment decline would not have its funding for the coming year cut as much; consequently, K-State will receive a cut of only $300,000 as opposed to a $1 million reduction under the old system. VICTORY.

— Tuition levels: ASK opposed changing the current student fee/state funding ratio of 25 percent and 75 percent, respectively. The bill was killed for this year. VICTORY.

— Residency requirements: ASK originated an amendment giving state residency to students whose parents leave the state following his or her high school graduation. However, the student must enroll in a Kansas institution no later than one year following his or her graduation to be eligible. The bill passed with the provision. VICTORY.

— Higher education governance: ASK originated an amendment requiring the Regents to conduct ongoing studies about student access to state institutions. The Legislature has not yet voted on the bill.

— Student salaries: ASK supported the Regents' request for an increase in on-campus student employee salaries, and the Legislature passed a 2.5 percent increase for the last six months of the fiscal year. VICTORY.

Fraternities report rip-off by visiting artist

By STACEY CAMPBELL
Collegian Reporter

An artist who said he was on a "peace tour" drawing sketches of K-State fraternity members in February was paid for artwork that he never completed, members at two fraternity houses said.

Earl Scarborough visited five fraternity houses and charged fraternity members $15 each for a sketch of themselves. However, Scarborough left town before drawing the sketches of members at two of the houses.

Scarborough received $145 from 10 men at FarmHouse fraternity, 1830 College Heights Road, but fraternity members never received the sketches, said Scott Fischer, junior in psychology and member of FarmHouse.

He was paid for three sketches at Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity, 1919 Platt St., but he did not finish the pictures, said Roger McClellan, junior in agricultural economics and AGR president.

In a Collegian interview with "Big Earl" Scarborough while he was at K-State, he said his tour, "A Study in Peace," was in conjunction with Black History Month. Scarborough said he thought it would be fun to do some "low-profile, in-depth contributions" for the month with his music, art and motivation.

Fischer said Scarborough built a trust in the members of FarmHouse. "First, he had articles from previous years, and he said he had been at other FarmHouse chapters across the nation," Fischer said. "His 'hello' presentation and his capabilities to draw the pictures gave him credibility. We believed him."

Fischer said the first night Scarborough visited the house he completed three members' sketches but made the other members pay before he drew their sketches.

"Big Earl" made us pay up front in cash," Fischer said. "He would take the money, draw your face and come back the next day with the finished picture if he could not complete it while he was here."

Mae Bauer, FarmHouse housemother, said in the five days that Scarborough was at FarmHouse, he was like a member of the house.

"He would come into the house and go right to work," Bauer said. "He visited with the guys, and he seemed almost a part of the house. His actions made you want to trust him."

After Scarborough's fifth day at FarmHouse, he left a note informing members that all pictures would be completed, sprayed with a protective finish and left with the president within two days, Fischer said.

Two days later, Fischer said, Scarborough told him he was taking a break from drawing.

"He said, 'Tell the fellows I'll be at the house on Monday,'" Fischer said. "But he never showed up."

Members of AGR fraternity also believed Scarborough's story.

"He was believable and very personable," said McClellan. "From listening to him, it sounded like he was trying to support a worthy cause."

Scarborough was at the AGR house for four days, McClellan said.

After spring break, Fischer filed a report with the K-State Police Department, and the police took statements from those members who did not receive their sketches.

Sgt. Rich Howard of the police department said Scarborough was arrested for unknown reasons in Chicago in 1958, and he was later convicted of disorderly conduct in 1960 in Douglas County.

Scarborough also left 15 unfinished sketches at FarmHouse. On the back of the sketches were the first names and the setting each person had requested. However, Fischer said the pictures left behind were not of FarmHouse members.

McClellan said Scarborough did not leave any pictures from other houses at the AGR house.

Fischer said Scarborough is a black male about 6-feet-2 and weighs about 215 pounds. He has black hair that is turning gray and a mustache.

James Tubach, investigator for the campus police, said other universities have received information on Scarborough through the teletype.

Scarborough's name has been entered into the National Crime Information Center, Tubach said, and he encourages members of greek organizations to call the police if they have suspicions about anyone coming to a house offering services.

"Our department would be glad to come to a fraternity or sorority to check a person out," Tubach said. "It's embarrassing to be taken (fooled). So people don't like to report it."

"Nobody likes to be taken by a con artist — and that is what he is — and he is good at it."

Scarborough also sketched men at Sigma Alpha Epsilon, Kappa Sigma and Pi Kappa Alpha fraternities. None have reported missing any sketches, Howard said.

Fraternities changing image

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer and SANDRA SIEBERT
Collegian Reporter

Many K-State fraternities have adopted their own dry rush policies, but a campus-wide dry rush policy has been rejected by the fraternities.

By a vote of 16-7, chapter presidents voted the proposal down at the IFC/PHC meeting April 27. The vote needed to be 17-6 in order to have a two-thirds majority.

Most of the fraternity presidents who voted against the proposal did so because of the vagueness of the wording itself.

Mike Mravunac, junior in management and Phi Kappa Tau president, said although he is not against dry rush, he is against the policy proposed by the IFC.

"(The proposal) is too loose, the language is vague," he said.

Mravunac said the "all organized rush activities" described in the proposal were not defined.

In addition, Mravunac said the fines are too steep for a policy in its early stages.

According to the proposal, the first offense for violating the rule would constitute a fine of $15 per active member in the house. A second offense would constitute one calendar year social probation from the date of the offense. And the third offense would constitute one calendar year intramural probation from the date of the offense.

In addition, after one offense, a fraternity would have to have a clean record without any violations for three calendar years.

"If a house is fined $15 per active member that would be about $600," he said. "That is a lot of money."

Other fraternities that voted against the proposal agree with Mravunac.

"There were too many loopholes in the proposal," said Jeff Oddo, junior in construction science and president of Phi Delta Psi.

"What exactly is an 'organized' activity?" he said. "If a couple of guys came up for the weekend, could we take them out for a few drinks?"

Another reason Oddo is against the proposal is how the violators of the policy would be judged. Oddo said the presidents of all the other fraternities would judge the house that had a violation.

"We would have to come before our peers, which would cause more hard feelings," he said. "IFS is supposed to improve fraternity relations, and this (proposal) would not."

Still other fraternity members do not like the dry rush policy at all, regardless of the wording.

"I just feel it steps on our right to drink since we are of age," said George LeRoux, senior in general arts and sciences and rush chairman of Phi Kappa Tau.

LeRoux said 95 percent of the people in his house do not want the proposal to pass.

"When we are rushing students it doesn't mean we are going to pressure them into drinking," he said. "I don't see why IFC needs to make up rules to govern our drinking habits."

LeRoux also said those houses that voted for the policy on April 27 did so because of their fraternities' national policies, not necessarily because they wanted it.

LeRoux is also unhappy with the fines that would be imposed on fraternities that violated the proposed IFC policy.

"I think it is a legislation to feed off the fraternities," he said.

"If (the proposal) passes, the next thing will be a movement toward non-alcoholic functions, then to a dry house because we will always have underage people in our houses," he said.

Even though this proposal was defeated, Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said 60-70 percent of the fraternities at the University have implemented their own dry rush policy.

Many rush chairmen think rush parties are better because of the absence of alcohol, Robel said.

"People have become increasingly aware of the problems of alcohol at rush parties," she said. "(In the past) people have been taking advantage of rush parties to drink instead of making an educated decision about their future."

For the past three years, Greek Affairs has led an educational campaign on alcohol awareness at rush parties by sending newsletters suggesting alternative party activities and various policies for consideration. Greek Affairs also sponsored workshops and seminars for rush chairmen to help them plan parties without alcohol.

Fraternities that already have individual dry rush party policies are doing well, she said.

"We're hearing lots of good comments that dry rushes are going over very well," Robel said. "Men in the chapters are getting better acquainted with prospective members. Dry rushes are better organized because they have to plan activities."

However, the number of rushees at the parties has decreased since the institution of the dry rush policy at Delta Upsilon, said Todd Shutts, sophomore in computer science and rush chairman.

But Shutts said the people who do come to the parties are interested in the fraternity instead of just getting drunk.

"It might have even gained us a little respect," Shutts said, because the fraternity seems more responsible.

The DUs began having dry rushes after encouragement from the national organization to have parties without alcohol.

It is probably the activities and not the absence of alcohol that makes the parties better, said Eric Fiolkoski, senior in mathematics and rush chairman for Phi Kappa Theta.

The Phi Kaps still serve alcohol at their rush parties, although less is served than in the past and non-alcoholic drinks are now available, he said.

Because alcohol is served, all guests at Phi Kap parties are requested to hand over their car keys at the door, Fiolkoski said. Two fraternity members who do not drink that evening are responsible for driving home anyone who has had too much to drink.

The main reason fraternities are instigating dry rush policies is the legal liability due to underage students, Robel said.

"There are several documented court cases where an underage rushee has consumed alcohol (at a rush party) and then been in an accident and then sued the (fraternity) chapter," she said.

K-State policy concerning alcohol at parties maintains that the laws of Kansas must be obeyed.

Robel said she is certain the dry rush proposal will come up again for a vote next year.

Comic book revisions attract adult readers

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

Although it has been said, it never really held much truth until the past couple of years: Comics aren't just for kids anymore.

Of the two major comic producers, DC and Marvel, DC has found it quite profitable to revise two of its oldest heroes, Batman and Superman.

DC scored major points with older readers with the Frank Miller four-part limited series "The Dark Knight Returns."

Review

The story takes place about 20 years in the future. Through McCarthy-like hearings, super heroes and their activities have been outlawed by public order.

With little hope and no heroes, Gotham City is now at the mercy of a newer, younger menace and this is what brings him out of retirement. The dark knight is older and out of practice, but he's no less committed to defending his city.

The media sensationalizes his exploits but is harsh in its commentary. Thus, his actions are seen as a dual threat to citizens and criminals alike.

Along the way, he's forced into a to-the-death duel with the Joker because of presidential order, against the Man of Steel.

Other characters are also brought back, but with interesting twists — Bruce Wayne's ever present but now grimly sarcastic butler, Alfred; a street-wise, gray-haired, trigger-happy commissioner Gordon; and even a new Robin. Because of an unexplained accident, the old Robin is gone. The new one is a fiercely optimistic, hard headed, 13-year-old red-haired girl named Kelly.

"Dark Knight Returns" is stark in its writing and grittily illustrated by Klaus Janson and Miller. By moving into the future, Miller has set the tone for the present. Some early response generated by Miller's intensifying of the Batman's character has called it "Rambo-izing."

True, the new Batman is more ominous, harder and mysterious, but he's also more believable as a hero and for the first time, as a man.

The monumental task of re-creating Superman rested with former Marvel artist/writer John Byrne.

His six-part series, appropriately titled "The Man of Steel," was indeed a complete restructuring of the entire Superman mythos, all the way from Krypton to Kansas.

Knowing of Krypton's unstable future, his father made the decision to send his only son, Jor-El, to a distant galaxy and tiny planet called earth. His mother objected to this. By Kryptonian standards, ours was primitive and barbaric. Spying through hyperspace and peering at a Kansas farm, she was shocked to see a man's bare chest. The farmer was standing in the outdoors and actually touching "unprocessed soil with his bare hands."

After being jettisoned to earth, the Byrne saga still places him in a small town, but with big changes. The Kents, who found and officially adopted him as their own, are much younger. And as far as the continuing storyline goes, they're still alive.

Although he knew of his abilities at an early age, he never entered a career as Superboy. And though found in a crashed rocket, the Kents had always thought him to be a Russian experiment gone awry with his powers being the result.

Eventually he ends up at the Daily Planet in Metropolis, but instead of typewriters, they use terminals. Lois Lane is still around, as is Jimmy Olsen and Lana Lang.

Lex Luthor is also revived, but instead of the hackneyed mad scientist, he's been shalacked with a Blake Carrington image. Luthor is now a mega-corporate head with involvements in everything from oil to international trade.

Also, Kent isn't a nerdy wimp anymore. He wears glasses, sure, but with his build and schoolboy good looks, he's attractive to half the women in the office. Byrne figures that the average person would think a man of Superman's power wouldn't have need for a secret identity. Therefore, why be suspicious of someone who may resemble him?

Byrne feels that Kent can afford to take chances and show off occasionally like typing faster than anyone in the office (with no errors) and never being sick. Once, while flying Lois home, she tried to direct him to her apartment but he beat her to the punch. "How did you know where I live?" she asked. "Lois," he grinned, "I know where everyone lives."

And finally, only Byrne could give plausible scientific accounts as to the Man of Steel's largely unexplained abilities.

For years, it's been hinted that Earth's yellow sun was the key to Superman's powers. Byrne surmises that with Kryptonian physiology, basic cell structures are each composed like tiny, powerful solar batteries.

His body collects and stores solar energy and manifests itself in the form of his superhuman abilities. Hence, prolonged deprivation of sunlight could temporarily rob him of his powers too.

Because of Earth's weaker gravity, his strength, skin thickness and other basic physical traits are also increased. As to his ability to fly, it's suggested that's probably a psionic capacity rather than physical.

His traditional weaknesses — magic and Kryptonite — are still there, but there's a twist also. Unlike the original storyline where the average person could just buy Kryptonite at their neighborhood K-Mart, Byrne was careful in its abundance this time. The small chunk that is in existence came to earth lodged inside of Superman's rocket, and, because of an unfortunate chain of events, Luthor possesses it.

Critics and rivals have labeled

Superman as the "big blue boy scout" because of his high-minded ideals of crime fighting. However, Batman, being the survivor of a crime that left him an orphan, has always been favored as becoming the more aggressive of the two heroes.

The story also uncovers and examines the major differences between two of comicdom's oldest myths.

As the survivor of a decimated world and race, Superman commits himself completely to his role of the defender of Earth. But that somewhat lofty goal always gave his character a somewhat stale and antiseptic feel.

The Batman, though just as dedicated, cares little for warrants, red tape and bureaucracy. All that matters to this obsessed crimefighter is his "holy war," his very personal yet public battle with crime and injustice.

The differences between the two have always been hinted at. Where Superman would say, "son," the Batman would say, "punk." While Superman would feel sorry for a criminal's psychological make-up, the Batman would feel more sorrow for the victims. The contrast is drawn sharpest when the president issues a special executive order for all heroes to cease activities. Superman obeys; the Batman doesn't.

"The Dark Knight Returns" and "The Man of Steel" both set out in bold territory for the comics industry. They succeed not only in reeling in new audiences but also in using credible human formulas.

Groups unite to fund industrial park plans

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

The KSU Foundation has teamed up with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce to plan a high-technology research and industrial park in Manhattan.

Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said the Foundation and the Chamber of Commerce will each donate $45,000 for the $90,000 study to be conducted by the Kansas City, Mo., law firm of Freilich, Leitner, Carlisle and Shortlidge.

Krause, William Boyd, Chamber of Commerce president, and Bill Muir, KSU Foundation director of economic development, will present a funding proposal to the city commission at 4 p.m. today. A similar proposal was introduced at the Riley County Commission meeting last Thursday. The Chamber of Commerce is expected to request $35,000 from the county and $10,000 from the city.

In last Thursday's presentation, Krause said the University has been actively exploring directions for research development since last February. Muir said the Foundation realized a need for developing a commercial outlet for research conducted.

"Due to the lack of state funding, the Foundation must make greater efforts toward independent economic development," Muir said. "However, initiatives which benefit the University must also benefit the region."

Krause agreed that the development of a high-tech research park must benefit everyone.

"We need to take a look at total community development, as well as the University's research development."

Boyd told the commission the study will analyze the potential of the Miller Ranch property west of Warner Park, from state highway K-18 to Anderson Avenue. He said a pro forma analysis indicated the 860-acre tract could be broken down into six components.

The high-tech restricted area of the park to be used by the University would cover 120 acres, while 150 acres would be designated for industrial purposes. A 120-acre commercial area could focus on wholesale, distribution and office facilities, but not necessarily retail businesses. A buffer zone of 200 acres would be composed of single-family dwellings and a golf course, and the remaining 270 acres would be left for open space and other infrastructure.

Boyd said the main purpose of the study is to determine how the land can be put to use without disturbing the existing residential areas. The study will determine the areas in which the University has research strengths which could be developed to meet commercial needs, and will also analyze the ways the land can best be used to develop the strengths of Manhattan and Riley County.

New dean named to college

BY KIM ZOLLMAN
Contributing Writer

Thomas L. Isenhour, dean of science at Utah State University, has been appointed dean of the College of Arts and Sciences to succeed William Stamey, who is retiring July 1.

Isenhour graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1961 and received his doctorate in analytical chemistry from Cornell University in 1965. He chaired the University of North Carolina's chemistry department from 1975-80. In 1980, he served on the North Carolina Board of Science and Technology. A year later, his book "Passing Freshman Chemistry" was published.

He was program director of the chemical analysis program in the Chemical Synthesis and Analysis section of the National Science Foundation from 1982-83. In 1984, he became dean of science at Utah State and since 1985, has been a joint associate director of biotechnology in Utah State's Agricultural Experiment Station. Last year, he was appointed to the U.S. committee for the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry.

His other accomplishments include writing several articles and being in frequent demand to contribute to seminars and workshops.

He described his move to K-State as "an exciting opportunity to participate in the development of a fine university."

Even though he will be dean, Isenhour said he intends to continue research in his field by moving equipment to K-State and maintaining an active lab. University administrators are still faculty members, and teaching and research was fun, he said.

Isenhour said as the 21st century approaches, he would like students to learn to think in a critical fashion, be able to communicate clearly, and have alternate ways of thinking because "these are revolutionary

Nuclear compact site delayed as foes plan to file petitions

By Staff and Wire Reports

LINCOLN, Neb. — Representatives for the member states of the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact discussed bidders' proposals Monday but did not select a builder for the regional facility.

Choosing a developer for the facility was the scheduled purpose of the annual Compact meeting but citizens in all of the Compact's states expressed disapproval of selecting between the two current bidders, US Ecology and Westinghouse.

Westinghouse Electric Corp. of Madison, Pa., and US Ecology Nuclear of Louisville, Ky., are vying for the multimillion-dollar contract to build the site.

At two public information meetings last week in Manhattan and Hays, citizens armed with documents and testimony on the two companies revealed uncomplimentary company records.

Citizen groups of two states promised to launch petition drives gathering support to withdraw from the radioactive waste Compact at the commission's meeting.

Sam Welsh of Chadron, chairman of the Western Nebraska Resources Council, said citizens this week will begin to shape a petition drive to allow voters to decide in November 1988 if Nebraska should withdraw from the five-state Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact.

Nebraska could join another compact or set up its own disposal site or sites, he said.

Bob Bland, a representative of an Arkansas citizens group, also promised a petition drive to put the same question to Arkansas voters in November 1988. His group wants to keep Arkansas waste at its one current disposal site, he said, which is the best place for it now.

"We intend to do everything in our power to stop the construction of this (regional) dump," he said.

Members of the group, the Central Interstate Citizens' Task Force, wore buttons reading, "Dump the Compact," as they told the commission their fears and frustrations. The group detailed its own agenda to the commission, which included a request for the commission to analyze how it spends its money aimed at receiving public input.

Welsh said the group is calling for the immediate rejection of the two developers' bids and a study to determine if the compact process is legally valid.

Welsh said US Ecology is responsible for two of the three low-level radioactive waste site closures nationwide due to groundwater contamination. Westinghouse has been cited 30 times since 1980 for violating state and federal environmental laws at toxic waste sites, he said.

Commissioners did take action on several motions introduced at an April 24 emergency Compact meeting in Kansas City, Mo. The commission at that meeting agreed to rework the Phase II Site Exclusionary Study, conducted by New York consultants, to remove all references to potential disposal sites. The study proposed more than 80 percent of viable sites to be in Kansas while identifying no sites in Oklahoma.

The commission Monday decided no state would have to host a second waste site until all other Compact states had hosted one site each.

Members agreed that no state must receive waste at a certain site after 30 years or after it contained 5 million cubic feet of waste, whichever happened first.

Members adopted a rule outlining a process for other states to join the Compact and decided to form a committee to examine the ramifications of a state withdrawing from the Compact. Several task force members spoke against penalizing states that choose to withdraw from the Compact.

The commission agreed that it should pay for travel expenses of one citizen representative of each state to attend Compact meetings.

College studies 'collider'

By KIM ZOLLMAN
Contributing Writer

The College of Architecture and Design received a $50,000 grant from the state to be part of the Kansas team designated to write a proposal for the federal government to build a supercollider in Kansas.

The proposed structure is a 52-mile long, ring-shaped, underground tunnel where physicists can initiate reactions to observe protons colliding at speeds higher than ever before. The supercollider is expected to help scientists understand what makes up the protons in atoms.

According to an article in the March 1986 issue of Scientific American, the $6 billion structure, scheduled for completion in 1996, would be the only facility scientists could use to prove some theories in physics and could lead to the discovery of new particles, such as what makes up a quark, the smallest particle of matter known.

The state awarded the grant to the college to investigate the project's community and design aspects, and in what ways Kansas would be a suitable site, said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

Kansas is one of 35 states competing for the supercollider, a project Lapping said would bring economic and social growth to the state winning the project.

Lapping said if Kansas wins the bid, the supercollider would be constructed south of Topeka in Osage County. It could bring 4,500 construction workers, 500 to 600 scientists and numerous technicians to the state.

The team is to determine whether archeological sites are at the proposed location and study the possible repercussions to the environmental habitats as well as how to make the facility and accompanying buildings above ground aesthetic.

The group is also studying how Kansas can accommodate the influx of people in housing, schools and hospitals, and how the state can maintain a high quality of life for most residents.

Kansas would be suitable because of good transportation, hospitals and schools, a low crime rate, high quality of life, close proximity to a large city and the Kansas work ethic of "an honest day's work for an honest day's pay" to which most workers adhere, Lapping said.

The team hopes to finish the report by mid-July in order to meet the Aug. 3 deadline. If Kansas obtains the supercollider, Lapping said it could "put us on the map for science and high technology."

The first phase, construction, would be the actual building of the facility, while the second phase commences when the facility begins operation and scientists perform experiments. Examining the serendipitous or "spin-off" effects of the supercollider such as the growth of high technology firms and other businesses in the area is the final phase.

Other state organizations working on Kansas' proposal include KPLCPL, Kansas Geological Survey, Kansas Biological Survey, Kansas Civil Rights Commission, Kansas Water Office and the state's departments of transportation, commerce and revenue.

U.S. bars entrance to aliens carrying deadly AIDS virus

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Edwin Meese III announced Monday that all immigrants who test positively for AIDS will be barred from entering the United States and that probation officers will be notified when inmates with the virus are released from prison.

At a news conference, Meese also said that the National Institute of Justice, a federal agency, will set up a data collection bank on AIDS to assist police officers who may have been exposed to the disease.

Meese directed the Immigration and Naturalization Service to develop a testing program that will deny entry to the United States to "all immigrants, refugees and legalization applicants" who test positive for acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

More than half a million people a year immigrate to the United States and the nation admits 60,000 refugees annually. As many as 1.9 million people are expected to apply for legalization in the next 11 months under the amnesty provisions of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986.

"A testing program of all aliens must be put in place to assist in detecting the presence of the virus," Meese told a news conference.

The program is designed to go in effect in the next few months, once rules are approved declaring AIDS a dangerous contagious disease. Proposed rules subject to public comment for the next 60 days were issued Monday by the Department of Health and Human Services.

Under the proposed rule, any person requesting permanent status in the United States would have to take an AIDS test.

The attorney general said that all 18,000 newly sentenced inmates committed to a federal prison each year will be tested for AIDS.

The government will also initiate testing for the AIDS virus of the estimated 15,000 inmates who are released from federal penitentiaries each year.

For those testing positive, "their...results will be relayed to the chief U.S. probation officer in the district where the prisoners are to

Toxic gas victims contract diseases

BHOPAL, India — A new government-sponsored medical study shows a large number of survivors of the 1984 Bhopal gas disaster are suffering from chronic diseases such as tuberculosis, a doctor said Monday.

More than 2,000 people were killed when methyl isocyanate leaked from a Union Carbide pesticides plant and wafted over densely populated shantytowns.

The report was completed last week by the government's Indian Council of Medical Research.

Of the 12,311 survivors examined by the team, about 9,299 were suffering from some disease, according to a doctor who participated in the research.

About 13.5 percent of those examined had tuberculosis, 15 percent respiratory problems and 15 percent suffered from failing eyesight, said the doctor, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

High court denies stay of execution

ANGOLA, La. — Alvin Moore Jr., convicted of raping and killing a woman nearly seven years ago, was denied a stay of execution by the U.S. Supreme Court on Monday, and he calmly awaited being put to death in Louisiana's electric chair.

Moore, 27, was condemned to die at the Louisiana State Penitentiary early today for killing Jo Ann Wilson, 23, of Bossier City, on July 10, 1980. Moore maintains he never stabbed the woman and that she voluntarily had sex with him.

His lawyers appealed to the Supreme Court on Monday, but the justices voted 7-2 to deny Moore's application for a stay of execution. Justices William J. Brennan and Thurgood Marshall, who oppose capital punishment, dissented.

Authorities said Moore met Wilson while he was working as a temporary painter's helper at the hospital where her husband worked.

Moore said he had visited Wilson twice when her husband was out and she gave him $5 or $10. On July 10, 1980, he said, she agreed to have sex with him and gave him a container of half-dollars.

Arthur Stewart and Dennis Sloan, who pleaded guilty to aggravated burglary charges, testified that Wilson was killed during a robbery that netted a stereo and a jar of pennies. They later recanted and said Wilson was standing at the door when they drove away.

Soybeans contain valuable nutrient

WASHINGTON — A form of dietary iron called iron II, which is usually found in meat, has been identified in fiber-rich soybean hulls, the Agriculture Department said Monday.

"Finding iron II in plant fiber is like walking through an auto junkyard and coming across a '57 Chevy without any rust on it," said Joseph A. Laslo, a biochemist at the department's Northern Research Center, Peoria, Ill.

Laslo's research was reported by the USDA's Agricultural Research Service, which operates the center.

Most iron in high-fiber plants is iron III, which combines with the plant fiber and is difficult for humans to absorb. But Laslo said the iron II discovered in soybean hulls is easily absorbed by the body.

Laslo said the results of his analysis could help promote the commercial use of soybean hulls to fortify breads and other baked products with more iron and fiber.

Secord to speak; attorneys protest

AUSTIN, Texas — Several dozen people gathered Monday to protest the scheduled appearance of retired Maj. Gen. Richard Secord at the State Bar Convention next Friday.

Some of those who carried placards in front of the State Bar Center identified themselves as Austin attorneys or law students.

Robert Soto, associate professor at the University of Texas Law School, said the purpose of the demonstration was to urge the State Bar to retract its invitation to the meeting in Corpus Christi, for which Secord will be paid $7,500.

"What information can Secord provide us?" Soto told the crowd.

Students to name new space shuttle

WASHINGTON — Students will be invited to suggest a name for the new space shuttle orbiter, to be built to replace the Challenger that exploded last year, the space agency announced Monday.

The replacement shuttle is tentatively scheduled for delivery in 1991 and the school project to select a name will be conducted during the 1988-89 school year, said officials of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

NASA Administrator James C. Fletcher said students nationwide will be asked to undertake a research project to develop the new name, and the agency will make the final choice.

Britain dominates Tony ceremonies

NEW YORK — The 1987 Tony awards reaffirmed the dominance of the British musical on Broadway.

In 12 of 19 competitive categories, English extravaganzas were the winners, especially "Les Miserables" which took home eight awards Sunday night, including best musical of the season. "Me and My Girl" topped three awards and "Starlight Express" picked up one. The three musicals are also the three biggest hits on the season.

Only "Fences," August Wilson's blistering drama of a black family in the 1950s, managed to stop the British invasion. It was named best play and also picked up awards for its stars, James Earl Jones and Mary Alice, as well as for its director, Lloyd Richards. It shut out another highly touted English entry, "Les Liaisons Dangereuses," which had seven nominations but didn't win any awards.

"Fences" was the season's most-honored play. Besides the Tony, it has won the 1987 Pulitzer Prize for drama as well as the New York Drama Critics Circle, the Drama Desk and Outer Critics Circle awards for best play.

Company offers funds to quitters

CHICAGO — Santa Fe Railway said Monday it would offer $50,000 to nearly 2,000 locomotive engineers and firemen willing to leave the company.

Santa Fe only expects between 150 and 200 workers to accept the lump-sum payment, "but we'll take anything to reduce employment," said spokesman Bob Gehrt.

The problem, Gehrt said, rests with firemen. In the past, they were needed to shovel coal into the locomotives, but the job has become obsolete.

If some engineers accept the offer, firemen can be promoted. If firemen leave the company or win a promotion, they don't have to be replaced, Gehrt said.

In addition, Santa Fe hopes to transfer some engineers out West, opening more spots for firemen who opt to stay with the company.

The payment offer runs until July 3; the transfers until June 22, Gehrt said.

Chicago-based Santa Fe, a subsidiary of Santa Fe Southern Pacific Corp., runs trains in 13 states, from Illinois to Texas and west to California.

College offers help to rural freshmen

By RITA GRAVES
Collegian Reporter

Starting this fall, a new program in the College of Arts and Sciences will help freshmen make the transition from small towns to the University.

Because incoming freshmen from small towns can sometimes be overwhelmed by the university setting, ambassadors from the college will begin a big brother/big sister retention program, said Mary Ann Brooks, sophomore in pre-law and chairwoman for the Arts and Sciences Ambassadors Committee.

"Not knowing where to go, what to do, and not having anyone to talk to can be really scary for freshmen who aren't used to being around a lot of people," she said.

Brooks said contacting freshmen who live in small towns by letter or phone and letting them know ambassadors are at K-State to assist them can have positive benefits for the University.

Brooks said the first three weeks are crucial for keeping freshmen happy so that they will not drop out.

"Letting students know of our program will help in recruitment," she said.

"If we can let them know that there is someone whom they can turn to for information — for example, how to register, how to get around campus, or if they just need someone to talk to — freshmen won't feel so alone."

"We will try to make them feel at home," Brooks said.

Although ambassadors will focus their attention on students who are far from home and live in small towns, they won't contact incoming freshmen who have brothers or sisters attending K-State, residents of Manhattan or those who are affiliated with a greek house, she said. "The transition is easier for students who come from big cities or who already know someone attending the University," Brooks said.

When the program is better established, the ambassadors will include transfer students, international students and any other students who are having difficulty adjusting to the demands of university life, she said.

"Right now we are going through a building process, but we are doing what we can to help those who need it the most," Brooks said.

Freshmen in undeclared majors are usually in arts and sciences, Brooks said. By assisting them, ambassadors might be able to help point them in the right direction for a major.

"Freshmen have enough pressure without having other things to worry about," she said.

Brooks said the Department of Political Science has a similar program called the Mentor Program.

The Kingsmen play before 4,000 people in City Park

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

A crowd of young and old gathered for an evening of "good ol' fashioned rock 'n' roll" as The Kingsmen entertained about 4,000 people in the Manhattan City Park Saturday.

The Kingsmen, a band best known for their popular recording of "Louie, Louie," were one of the first in a series of performing artists scheduled for "Arts in the Park 1987."

When the concert began, those in the audience were content to tap their feet and clap from the many lawn chairs, benches and blankets on which they were seated.

As the five-member band continued to play such rousing rock favorites as "Pretty Woman," "Blue Suede Shoes," "Tutti-Fruiti" and "Hand Jive," more than 100 audience members found it hard to contain themselves and rose from their seats to dance in front of the stage.

But it was the "original party song," "Louie, Louie," for which most of the crowd had come and waited for, and when the bass guitar signaled the song's beginning toward the end of the concert, both young and old went wild.

"You all know this song. It is the original party song, so why don't you sing along with us," said lead singer Mike Mitchell, challenging the crowd.

At this point, a man in his 30s standing with his family let out a scream and began clapping with the rhythm and singing the song with the crowd. His young son looked disbelievingly at him, covered his face and said, "God, Dad, you're embarrassing me!"

Several of the people dancing around the stage stood on each other's shoulders and a few had to be pulled off the stage throughout the performance of the song.

"Things got a little bit out of control, but otherwise, the concert was a success," said Don Cukjati, the program's director. "Everyone seemed to really enjoy the show."

The Kingsmen originally formed in 1960 when the members were in high school in Portland, Ore.

"We all were high school chums who put the band together to play at high school parties and functions," Mitchell said. "It was also a good way to meet girls."

The first song they recorded happened to be their biggest hit. Mitchell said "Louie, Louie" was first written and recorded by Richard Berry in Los Angeles in 1955. In 1963, the Kingsmen learned the song and recorded it. According to Billboard Magazine, the song hit the No. 2 position in January 1964 and was the No. 18 song for the year.

"It had been a big song in the Northwest for some time. About a week after we recorded 'Louie, Louie,' Paul Revere and the Raiders also recorded it," Mitchell said.

Mitchell attributes the success of the Kingsmen's version to the right timing and right place.

Critics have claimed that the voice of the original lead singer, Lynn Easton, stood out from the rest due to his "garbling" of the lyrics making many believe that he was singing something obscene. However, the band denied the accusations, said Kevin Wagner, program director for KQLA radio.

As for the song's unwavering popularity and nationwide appeal, Mitchell said that it was "just a great party song."

"When people hear the song, they think of good times, party times — it brings back good memories and makes them feel good."

The Arts in the Park concert at 8 tonight will feature the Municipal Band. Wednesday night, a puppet theater from 7 to 8 p.m., will precede the showing of Walt Disney's "Song of the South." The Smokey Hill River Band will perform at 8 p.m. Thursday.

Secretary reveals part in Iran-Contra affair

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Fawn Hall, Oliver North's former White House secretary, told congressional committees Monday that she helped him shred a foot and a half stack of documents as the Iran-Contra affair began unraveling last fall, then walked out of the White House with other papers hidden in her clothing.

Hall said she took internal office notes past White House guards in her boots and in her clothes behind her back on Nov. 25, the day President Reagan fired North as a national security aide.

She also described altering documents at the direction of North and hurriedly shredding so many documents they jammed the shredding machine in North's White House office.

"I was just purely doing my job," Hall said.

Testifying under a grant of immunity from prosecution, Hall recounted the destruction and alteration of papers just before Attorney General Edwin Meese III interviewed North during a weekend investigation he conducted at Reagan's request. North was fired the following Tuesday.

The 27-year-old part-time model, who was secretary to North for four years, spoke of unquestioning loyalty to him and said she didn't object or ask for explanation when he ordered her to alter memos.

"I believe in Col. North and I know there must have been a good reason why he was asking me to do this," Hall said. "I did as I was told."

Hall, who testified for 2½ hours and will return on Tuesday, said she gave the documents to North's attorney at the time, Thomas Green.

She said North had earlier emptied his office safe of documents while she put "maybe a foot and a half" of them into the shredding machine. She said when the machine jammed, she called the White House's crisis management center, and a repairman made a quick repair.

The shredded documents included copies of North's telephone logs and computerized interoffice memos that National Security Council officials used to communicate with one another.

She also said that at North's order she altered the texts of five sensitive documents in National Security Council files. She said she began making copies and destroying the originals but was interrupted to begin shredding.

One alteration she described concerned a 1985 memo from North that referred to the possible sinking or seizure of a ship carrying weapons to Nicaragua. The alteration was made obvious, she acknowledged, because the NSC letterhead paper used for the altered version was new and did not exist when the original was written.

Hall described putting through a call from Reagan to North at a hotel shortly after North had been fired. She talked to North later and recalled, "He said the president called him an American hero, and he just didn't know." She said North didn't explain the last part of that comment.

ELIGIBILITY FOR CARE AT LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER

- Health fees are established upon the recommendation of the Student Senate with approval by the Board of Regents.
- All students who are enrolled and attending classes during a regular semester or summer session who have paid health fees are eligible for care.
- Those enrolled in Special Courses, for varying periods of time, who have made previous arrangements for health care coverage at Lafene are eligible for care. (Lists of these students must be furnished prior to being seen at Lafene.)
- Only students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene; however, they must pay the spouse fee within 10 days of the time their own health fees are paid. (Children cannot be seen.)
- Emergency care, prior to referral, will be given anyone who comes in.
- Students enrolled in 6 hours or less, electing not to pay the health fee during the Fall or Spring semesters, who wish to be seen, will be charged $20 for each office visit. This charge continues until the full health fee has been exceeded, then that student will be afforded the same privileges as the regular fee paying student for the remainder of that semester.
- Students who were enrolled in the Spring and pre-enrolled for the Fall semester but not attending summer school may pay $15 and be eligible for care during the summer. This fee may be paid within 30 days prior to summer registration and ends the day classes begin. A late fee of $20 will be accepted for the remainder of the summer.
- Health fees are good until 12 o'clock the night the next semester begins.

NOTE: In addition to the above mentioned fees, there are minimal charges for certain supplies and services and the charges are subject to change without prior notice.

Elimination of missiles seen as a positive step

After a rather dubious beginning, the latest round of arms control talks witnessed an encouraging development last Monday. West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl's ruling coalition agreed to a Soviet proposal that would eliminate from Europe missiles with a range of more than 300 miles.

Kohl's decision to endorse the plan was contingent upon only one condition — that West Germany be allowed to keep 72 Pershing 1-A launchers. These missiles, which have a range of about 450 miles, are part of the West German air force, although its nuclear warheads are under U.S. control.

Should negotiations continue and the plan be implemented, the question of whether the Pershings are U.S. or German weapons will have to be resolved, since Moscow has claimed they are, in fact, U.S. weapons and thus subject to U.S.-Soviet arms reductions. In the meantime, however, it is encouraging simply to see some level of agreement between the Soviet Union and the nations of Western Europe.

An equally encouraging aspect of the decision is that it demonstrates cooperation between Western European nations and the United States. One of the greatest obstacles to serious arms reduction negotiations has long been the in-fighting between the various NATO allies.

While it is a positive step, the plan is by no means an all-inclusive arms control agreement. For one thing, the possibility exists that the Soviets or Americans will remove the weapons from Europe, only to deploy them along the Soviet-Chinese border or in Turkey respectively. For another, it does not eliminate short-range tactical weapons — probably the first nuclear weapons to be used in an exchange.

Still, with backing from Bonn and a unified NATO position, this could be the first step in reversing a costly and dangerous nuclear arms buildup.

Redevelopment clutter won't be here forever

As the redevelopment of downtown Manhattan continues on its course to completion, it seems two things are in order: appreciation and patience.

All of us in Manhattan and the surrounding communities should be proud and pleased with the progress thus far on the redevelopment. Coordinating the construction of a new mall and other aesthetic changes is difficult and time consuming. Amid all this work it could be easy to lose sight of the ultimate goal of incorporating the existing style and appearance of downtown into a new and refreshing center of activity. However, in Manhattan's case, the addition of parquet sidewalks, antique-appearing street lamps and small trees is a sign that the goal has not been overlooked to this point.

Eventually, downtown will again be an appealing, positive part of Manhattan, something many other cities fail at no matter how large their budgets for redevelopment. And while many of the changes are simply cosmetic in nature, it must be remembered that this new look helps facilitate a new attitude.

So with all these changes it is only appropriate to step back and enjoy the new look and to extend patience when traffic lanes become closed or when plywood boards become temporary sidewalks.

Police act responsibly during KKK's protest

Eight years ago, five people were killed in Greensboro, N.C., in a confrontation between members of the Ku Klux Klan and the Communist Workers Party. Sunday, the Klan again marched through Greensboro, and again, the scene threatened to turn ugly. Fortunately, no one was hurt, although five people were arrested.

According to news reports, the Greensboro police officers seem to have acted admirably. While the Klan's views are hardly acceptable, the police attempted to protect its members' right to free speech, as well as that of the onlookers.

In a society where the views of all are supposedly subject to equal protection under the law, it is sometimes difficult to expect police officers to act in such a manner — especially when they are commissioned to protect the rights of bigots.

Khomeini's atrocities known

The letter, "Brutal Regime," (May 1, 1987) by Mohsen Pournazari, whose name appears to be Iranian, reflects its author's concern for the people of Iraq. Since the letter also reflects its author's concern for human rights, it is very reasonable to draw his attention to Khomeini's human rights record in Iran:

a. On Friday, Nov. 28, 1986, the 41st session of United Nations General Assembly, for a second consecutive year, adopted a resolution condemning Khomeini's persistent violation of the most fundamental human rights in Iran. This resolution condemns "specific and detailed allegations of violation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran such as summary and arbitrary executions...."

b. On March 13, 1987, the 43rd session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva, Switzerland, condemned, for the sixth consecutive year, the Khomeini's continuing grave violation of human rights in Iran. In its resolution, UNHRC again expresses its "deep concern over numerous and detailed allegations of grave human rights violations... in particular those related to the right to life, the right to freedom from torture." This resolution referred to the list of names and particulars of 12,028 victims of political executions by the Khomeini, published by the People's Mojahedin

MAGEED K. ABASS

Guest Columnist

Organization of Iran.

c. The European Parliament, IA, and other human rights organizations, have also repeatedly condemned Khomeini's human rights violations. The 1985 European Parliament issued a resolution stating that it was "appalled at the continuing torture and killing of political opponents by the Khomeini's regime in Iran, which is estimated to have led to the imprisonment of 120,000 people and 40,000 executions, full particulars of 10,231 of which have been published by the PMOI and include 18 pregnant women and 430 juveniles and children." The resolution also "condemns the continuing violation of human rights by the Khomeini's regime and expresses revulsion at the torture and execution of political opponents...." Furthermore, the European Parliament "expresses support for the movement for peace and freedom spearheaded by the National Council of Resistance of Iran and PMOI."

d. Since June 20, 1981, Khomeini has executed more than 50,000 and has jailed another 140,000. The names, pictures and particulars of 12,028 of the victims are published by the PMOI. Furthermore, PMOI has learned of and documented 64 types of torture practiced by Khomeini's guards, the addresses of more than 600 prisons and torture chambers used by Khomeini and particulars of more than 1,200 guards responsible for the torture and executions. These documents can be obtained from PMOI through the Iran Liberation, 4200 Wisconsin N.W., Suite 106-154, Washington, D.C. 20016.

e. On March 13, 1983, the Iraqi government and Rajavi, a PMOI leader, signed a peace treaty that has received world-wide acceptance and support. Meanwhile, many requests have been made by United Nations officials and many countries including the United States and the Soviet Union to end the war. Ignoring all these requests, Khomeini has insisted on pursuing the bloody war against the people of Iraq.

It should be borne in mind that these and other crimes committed by Khomeini have nothing to do with either the religion Islam or the Iranian culture. Khomeini is inherently inhuman and illegitimate and to overcome his acute internal crisis, a reflection of the continuing conflict between his regime and the Iranian people, his characteristics of inhumanity, warmongering and export of terrorism are inevitable. This is why he is hated by the majority of the Iranian population and a greater part of the world.

We need to hear from readers

As classes begin, those of us on the Collegian editorial staff have been sharpening our pencils and honing our wits in anxious anticipation of the first issue of the summer. With that issue it seems only fitting to introduce our readers to the workings of the editorial page and the editorial board.

Who are we? Specifically, we are the people who unremotely subject you, the readers, to our opinions and our attitudes on whatever subject we deem deserving of our time. And while some of you will tire of our ideas, we hope you will find them sufficiently entertaining, or inspiring, or enraging to make you continue to read, and, more importantly, incite you to respond.

Probably the most important function of the editorial page is to provide you, the

LISA CHURCH
Editorial
Page Editor

readers, with a forum for your views. We invite you, in fact, we entreat you to write a letter to the editor whenever you have a comment — complimentary or critical — concerning something you read on this page or something you've noticed which you believe deserves attention.

The summer editorial page will adhere to last semester's policy of printing unsigned staff editorials. Though some have objected to this policy, it seems the most appropriate method of handling those editorials since they represent the collective opinion of the editorial board rather than the single opinion of an individual.

We urge you to respond to these editorials and to any other column, article or letter to the editor with which you agree or disagree. Remember, this page is open to your ideas. So when you get tired of reading our ideas, or are annoyed with the opinions we hold, do something about it — send in a letter or volunteer to write a guest column of your own.

What Abrams doesn't know...

As weeks go in the congressional hearings on the Iran-Contra affair, last week was a fairly good one. On Tuesday, Elliot Abrams, assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs, testified that he knew nothing of the apparently illegal Contra supply effort. In fact, Abrams said, he made it a point not to know. "I was careful not to ask Colonel North questions I did not need to know the answers to."

That's what has kept this administration intact so far — not just a profound level of ignorance, but a conscious effort to remain profoundly ignorant. It's not easy being that ignorant; it takes a good measure of self-discipline and an intense desire to overlook facts. One thing I'll say for Abrams though, when it comes to ignorance, he certainly has the right stuff.

Although Abrams was aware that Lt. Col. Oliver North was more knowledgeable on the Contra war than anyone else in the administration and although Abrams' boss, Secretary of State George Shultz, asked Abrams to "monitor Ollie," apparently at no point did Abrams ask North about the Contra war and how it was being funded and supplied. Even after the C-123 cargo plane carrying Eugene Hasenfus and some AK-47 rifles was shot down in October, Abrams continued to ignore the matter.

That's the kind of dedication to ignorance this administration not only prides itself on, but has come to depend on. Like many in the administration, including the president, Abrams bases his defense on his lack of knowledge. And while his defense is not wholly airtight, it is difficult to discredit — who, after all, could argue convincingly that Abrams is not as dumb as he says he is?

What is really interesting about Abrams' testimony though, as a friend of mine remarked, is his undying optimism. By his own account, Abrams was careful not to learn of the Contra supply effort. In fact, he made it a point not to know what he was talking about. And yet he apparently had no trouble last autumn making "categorical" assurances to Congress that there was no U.S. government involvement in the operation. Like many in the administration, Abrams is a master at assuming the best while knowing the least.

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian
Columnist

It's not difficult to see where Abrams gets his optimism — on the same day Abrams admitted to deceiving Congress, George Shultz was telling reporters that Abrams is "a person of tremendous energy and integrity, and I am sure he will emerge in that light." Not to be outdone, the president and his staff joined the Optimists Club on Thursday as presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater chimed in with a cheery, "we share the secretary's view."

Thursday was also the day the congressional committees granted limited immunity to Oliver North. When this brouhaha first broke, North told reporters, "I don't think there is another person in America who wants to tell his story as much as I do." After almost six months of taking the Fifth and dodging the congressional committees, North might finally get his chance. According to one news story, North could testify as early as July 16.

Also on Thursday, it was revealed that retired Maj. Gen. Richard Secord benefited personally from the Iranian arms sales. For some reason, members of the congressional committees acted like this was a big surprise. In the spirit of Tammy Bakker and the PTL scandals, Secord spent at least $86,722 on a Porsche, an airplane and a trip to a "fat farm" health spa. This was even better than a few weeks ago when it was revealed that Oliver North had spent Contra money on snow tires, groceries and panty hose.

Sandwiched between the scandals somewhere, Iranian businessman Albert Hakim testified on Wednesday that he set up a special $200,000 account for the education of North's children in the event North was killed in the line of duty. This revelation wasn't nearly as exciting as some of the other testimony, but it did add to the number of laws possibly broken by North, since it is illegal for government officials to accept payoffs.

The account set up by Hakim was code-named "button," which was short for "bellybutton." Hakim explained this was an allusion to a joke between him and North. Unfortunately, Hakim didn't get a chance to retell the joke. I don't even want to speculate on what the joke might involve, although I heard the National Enquirer is running a story with full-page photos in which it is revealed that North has an "outie."

By Friday, things had settled down a bit, although President Reagan was saying he would push for a U.N. resolution to impose an arms embargo on Iran and Iraq. This is the man who, last October, sent missiles to Iran to gain the release of hostages and, at the same time sent the secretaries of state and defense to the Middle East and China to convince other nations not to sell arms to Iran. Like I said, it was a great week for optimism.

'Cats' snare honors, win national awards

By BILL LANG
Staff Writer

In the final two days of competition at the NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships in Baton Rouge, La., K-State had four individuals place in the top six in their respective events, bringing home All-America honors.

Pinkie Suggs took second in the shot put; Kenny Harrison placed second in the triple jump; Jackie Struckhoff was fourth in the 10,000-meter run; and Felicia Carpenter took sixth in the triple jump.

Suggs' second-place finish in the shot put came on her first throw of the finals competition. Her throw of 54 feet, 10-3/4 inches was followed by two shorter throws.

"It started off bad," Suggs said. "The officials called two fouls on me, and I didn't think I had fouled. The people in the stands didn't think I had fouled either."

Suggs said she was happy with second place.

Regina Cavanaugh of Rice, became the first female to win three consecutive outdoor titles as she won the event with a put of 56-10 3/4.

Harrison took second in the triple jump behind Frank Rutherford of the University of Houston. Rutherford sailed 56-1 while Harrison landed at 55-2 3/4.

Carpenter, earning her third All-America honor, ripped-off a jump of 43-3 to capture sixth place. Taking first place honors was Sheila Hudson of California-Berkeley with a world-record mark of 45-2.

Struckhoff finished fourth in the 10,000-meter run with a time of 34:52.25. Patricia Murray of Western Illinois took first with the time of 33:28.27.

The K-State women's team finished the meet with 16 points, while the men's team scored eight points behind Harrison's effort.

'Cats' win final three; leave 'Huskers saying 'Aw shucks!'

By JEFF RAPP
Staff Writer

The 'Cats could have laid down and died, but they rose to the occasion.

The K-State baseball team headed into its season-ending four-game series against the Nebraska Cornhuskers with a 6-11 conference record and nothing to gain except a little bit of pride.

Not only did the team gain pride, but it gained fifth place in the Big Eight and kept Nebraska out of first place by taking three of four games from the 'Huskers.

K-State posted a 9-12 conference record and a 28-24 overall record to boast its first winning season since the 1982 campaign, when the 'Cats were 29-27.

Nebraska, ending up 36-19 overall, could have taken first place in the Big Eight with four wins over K-State, but the pesky 'Cats dropped the 'Huskers to 12-8 and a third-place finish in the conference.

"We came in ready to play. We have no excuses," said Nebraska coach John Sanders. "(K-State) just played real good ball and beat us."

At first, though, it looked like Nebraska would achieve its goal of sweeping K-State and finishing on top of the Big Eight.

The 'Huskers blasted the 'Cats 8-2 in the first game of the May 9 double-header, but from then on it was all K-State, as the 'Cats won later that day, 3-2, and swept Nebraska in the May 10 double-header, 17-15 and 6-1.

In the 17-15 slugfest, Scott Spangenberg, Russ Ringgenberg, Otto Kaifes, David Chadd, Jeff Turtle and Tom Parsons had home runs to keep K-State close in the first seven innings. They trailed 15-13 when relief pitcher Marty Darnell held Nebraska scoreless in the final two innings. The 'Cats went on to win by two runs.

In the season final, pitcher Mike Hinkle had an ideal final game as a senior. He held Nebraska to one run and hit a two-run homer in the fifth inning to seal the victory.

First-year head coach Mike Clark said he is pleased with how his players responded this season.

"The most gratifying thing about this season is the manner in which our kids maintained their level of play when we had injuries. The real key to a success is when a team believes it can play with anybody. In the last month of the season we believed we could compete with any team in the nation," Clark said.

Earlier this season K-State surprised eighth-ranked Arkansas, 4-3, and destroyed 25th-ranked Oral Roberts, 17-9. Nebraska was ranked 22nd prior losing three games to K-State, which marked the first time since the 1974 season the 'Cats took a series from Nebraska.

"It's a feeling of satisfaction and of a job well done," Clark said. "All you can do is ask the kids to do their very best, and I know that's how our kids compete all season."

Minnesota stops K.C.

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Pinch-hitter Gene Larkin lined a bases-loaded triple into the right field corner in the seventh inning to rally the Minnesota Twins past the Kansas City Royals, 5-3, Monday night.

The Twins' third straight victory moved them within one game of first place Kansas City in the American League West. It also spoiled the return of Royals Manager Billy Gardner, making his first appearance in the Metrodome since the Twins dismissed him in 1985.

With the score tied 2-2, Roy Smalley led off the seventh with a single and went to second on Tom Brunansky's infield single before being replaced by pinch-runner Greg Gagne.

Rec complex offers summer intramurals

By The Collegian Staff

For those people looking to stay in shape during the summer months, K-State is offering several intramural sports.

Competition is open to summer school students, faculty and staff. Students not enrolled in summer school are not eligible for intramurals.

Individuals may compete on only one team in the men's or women's divisions and one co-rec team.

Non-student spouses may compete on co-rec teams only. Spouses must be participating members of the same team. Non-student "friends" may not compete.

All other intramural rules apply.

The following is the list of sports that will be offered during summer school:

Slow-pitch softball, 3-wall handball, 4-wall handball, 3-wall racquetball, 4-wall racquetball, tennis, doubles volleyball, and basketball.

Deadline for entry for these activities is June 12. Play begins June 16. Registration for teams may be done at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The faculty/staff golf tournament will be June 19, and the deadline is June 18. The student golf tournament will be June 26; deadline is June 25.

Concerts cause riots by East German fans

By The Associated Press

BERLIN — Thousands of East Germans, crowding against police lines near the Berlin Wall to hear an open-air rock concert in West Berlin, clashed again with police in fighting that went into the early morning hours.

It was the third and most violent night of violence as police barred the East German fans, many chanting "The wall must go!" from approaching the wall.

Witnesses said at least 50 people were arrested as about 1,000 club-wielding police charged a crowd estimated at about 4,000 shortly before midnight Monday after the concert had ended.

Some people threw firecrackers, bottles and rocks at the police, who dragged demonstrators from the crowd, punched many in the face and stomach before loading them in vans. The number of injured could not be determined.

On Saturday and Sunday 3,000 to 4,000 East Germans gathered near the Brandenburg Gate each evening hoping to hear the concerts just on the other side of the wall.

By 1 a.m., most of the crowd on the Unter den Linden boulevard had dispersed and police had regained control.

The violence started only after the concert by the British rock group Genesis had ended and the police began advancing on the crowd. By that time, witnesses said, many of the rock fans appeared to be intoxicated.

Some automobiles on Unter den Linden were damaged when people stood on them to get a better view. The boulevard is lined with embassies, and many of the damaged cars were diplomats' vehicles.

Monday's concert was the last in the series of three that were performed outside the Reichstag building in West Berlin about 200 yards from the wall.

East German police, standing shoulder-to-shoulder, had formed a blockade about 1,000 yards from the wall that divides this city into eastern and western sectors.

West Germany's ARD television network said one of its camera technicians was beaten by police when he tried to film the fighting and a correspondent for the network was arrested. ARD did not identify them.

A correspondent for North German Radio of Hamburg was detained briefly and released, but his cassettes were confiscated, the station reported.

Before and during the concert, the East German fans chanted anti-wall slogans, set off fireworks and sang the "Internationale," the Socialist anthem.

In West Berlin, tens of thousands of people gathered in front of the Reichstag, the former German Parliament, to hear the concert.

Sunday night, about 3,000 East Germans had gathered near the wall to hear the concert by the Eurythmics and in the violence that followed hundreds of club-wielding police arrested 20 to 30 people, witnesses told The Associated Press. It was not known if anyone was injured.

On Saturday, during a performance by David Bowie, about 50 East Berlin youths threw stones and bottles at police keeping them away from the wall, but no arrests were reported.

Communist East Germany built the 29-mile-long, 14-foot-high barrier in August 1961 to keep its citizens from fleeing to the West. It is guarded day and night by police with orders to shoot to kill would-be escapees. West Berlin is a Western enclave 110 miles inside Communist East Germany.

Health care spending expected to increase

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Spending on health care in America will reach 15 percent of the gross national product by the end of the century, up from 10.9 percent currently, according to a published report.

Health-care costs are expected to more than triple by the year 2000, from the current level of $458 billion to $1.5 trillion, according to a report obtained by The Washington Post.

The annual report from the Health Care Financing Administration found that changes in the way health services are used, rather than the aging of the population, will be one major reason behind the rise in health-care costs, the newspaper said in its Tuesday editions.

The report, expected to be released soon by the Department of Health and Human Services, projected annual spending on health care would grow from $1,837 per person in 1986 to $5,551 in the year 2000.

times in education."

Provost Owen Koeppe said Isenhour was the best qualified candidate because of his administrative and educational experience, and could provide strong leadership in playing a key role in the core curriculum development at K-State.

"Not to belittle the schools of professions, but if you don't have a strong arts and sciences (college), you can't have a strong university," said Koeppe, stressing the importance of Isenhour's new position.

Associate Dean Jack Carpenter will serve as acting dean until Sept. 1, when Isenhour will start serving his appointment at an annual salary of $80,000.

Research

The proposed study has three phases. The first is a data-gathering phase, which Krause said has already begun for the University, but won't accelerate until late June.

The data gathered in phase 1 of the study, primarily information on existing conditions, will be used in phase 2, which consists of a series of meetings to determine the direction to be taken.

Phase 2 consists of seven separate parts, including the assessment of market data regarding research parks and business communities, developing a possible land plan for the project site and considering approaches to development and financing. Phase 3 will be providing all parties involved with the results.

Boyd told the county commissioners the results of developing a research/industrial park in Manhattan could be "fantastic." He predicted the Chamber of Commerce and the Foundation will spend $5 million to $8 million dollars over a 20-year period to develop the land but that $100 million is the potential for capital investment.

Boyd said he is very optimistic that the county and the city will both lend financial support to the study.

Darrell Westervelt, chairman of the Riley County Commission, said the study sounds like a good idea, and the commissioners were enthusiastic about what they were told. The commissioners will wait for a formal request before making a decision, he said, but the unofficial amount of $35,000 sounds feasible.

"I suspect, just to make a prediction, that we would support that amount," Westervelt said. "You never know for sure until the vote's been taken."

be returned," said Meese.

On another part of the program, the attorney general said that the National Institute of Justice will begin collecting data on police incidents in which law enforcement officials may encounter the AIDS virus through contact with offenders.

NIJ will collect information that might involve occupational transmission of the virus to police and will establish a hotline telephone that police can use to obtain current information on the disease.

Meese's announcement is designed to implement President Reagan's program outlined in a May 31 speech in which the president said he will seek expanded testing for AIDS.

AIDS, or acquired immune deficiency syndrome, is a contagious disease that attacks the body's immune system, rendering it incapable of resisting other diseases and infections.

The chief victims of AIDS have been homosexual men and intravenous drug users. Health officials estimate that heterosexual contact is responsible for 4 percent of cases and that between 1 million and 1.5 million Americans have been exposed to the virus.

Sutton resigns from position

MICHAEL MORRIS
Staff Writer

William Sutton announced Wednesday morning he will resign as vice president for educational and student services effective Aug. 17 and join the faculty in the Division of Biology.

Sutton, who came to K-State in August 1985 from Chicago State University, said he resigned because he wishes to return to teaching biology.

"It's a matter I thought about for sometime. I think that when you have taught as long as I have, and then you do administrative work and have been as effective as you hope to be in administration, you think you might want to get back to teaching, so you make that decision," said Sutton, who has a doctorate in biology with an emphasis in zoology.

President Jon Wefald said he can understand the reason for Sutton's decision.

"Like all of us (in the administration), from time to time we think about going back to teaching. I think Dr. Sutton has thought about the possibility of returning to teaching for the last couple of years. He is a good zoologist in the Division of Biology," Wefald said.

Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for minority affairs, said he was surprised by Sutton's announcement of resignation.

"I will certainly miss Bill Sutton. I really enjoyed working with him in that capacity, and I'm sure he will do a fantastic job as professor of biology. I'm just grateful that we haven't lost him completely," Switzer said.

Student Body President Kent Bradley, senior in nutrition science, said he, too, was surprised by the announcement.

"I sure wasn't expecting such an announcement. I know student government and Student Senate will miss his participation in our programs and meetings; however, we respect his decision," Bradley said.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, said he was pleased about Sutton joining the staff.

"We are looking forward to it. He has had a very distinguished career," Johnson said.

Sutton said he was unsure about how Wefald plans to fill his position, but if Wefald was to request his help in selecting a candidate, he would do what he could.

Wefald said the position and the entire student services operation will be evaluated to see if any new changes can be made to improve operations.

"Within the next two weeks, the whole area and function of student affairs will be examined to coordinate one continuum contact with students from the first time all the way through alumni affairs," Wefald said.

"I have been as effective as I hoped to be," Sutton said. "You look at your options, and maybe I will be happier doing something else."

Journalism department moves forward, assesses damage of losing accreditation

By SUSAN D. BAIRD
Managing Editor

Although the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications has lost accreditation for at least two years, Carol Oukrop, head of the department, remains optimistic about its future.

"(Losing accreditation) is not the end of the world," Oukrop said.

Although the site-visit team recommended provisional accreditation after reviewing the department's progress for 1980-86, the Accrediting Council on Education in Journalism and Mass Communications voted to deny re-accreditation to the program, which had been accredited for 40 years.

Out of about 350 journalism schools throughout the nation, Oukrop said, about 90 were accredited by the council.

According to the final evaluation report, five key deficiencies existed: inadequate budget, non-compliance with the council's curriculum standard, inadequate faculty scholarship, failure to pursue affirmative action aggressively and inadequate faculty supervision of internships.

Oukrop said the decision was not appealed because the main problems of curriculum and budget would not have been corrected by the time of an on-site team's visit this fall.

"Things aren't going to be that different," she said. "I saw no sense to fight it."

But Oukrop said President Jon Wefald has been very supportive of the faculty's decision to reapply for accreditation in spring 1988.

Concerning the curriculum, Oukrop said the department's guidelines were not in compliance with the council's.

"We were letting students take too much journalism," she said. "That's our big sin."

The department had an 84/36 rule stating students must have 84 to 90 hours outside the department and 30 to 36 hours of journalism coursework. But the council requires a minimum of 90 hours outside the department, 65 of which must be in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Phase-out of the department's rule began in 1985, Oukrop said, and the 1986-88 catalog states the department requires 90 hours outside the department.

For the department to be accredited, 95 percent of the students must be in compliance with the national guideline, she said. When the on-site team visited in fall 1986, only 61 percent of the students were in compliance.

"We have been in compliance...since fall 1986, but we have a lot of students in the pipeline," who would not be in compliance this fall, Oukrop said.

The second major problem, she said, was with the department's budget, which was $22,066 for fiscal 1986-87.

The final evaluation report stated: "Based on figures from the 1986 Regents Review, the Department should be entitled to more than $50,000 additional revenue."

In addition to his moral support, Oukrop said, Wefald has assured her the department will receive:

— A 50 percent increase in the general operating expense budget to $33,099 for fiscal 1987-88 and an additional $7,000 for the fiscal 1988-89 budget;

— One additional tenure tract faculty position beginning in fall 1988. Out of 15 full-time faculty, eight are currently tenured;

— The conversion of a temporary faculty position into a tenure position in fall 1988; and — One additional tenure position who specializes in video on the radio and television faculty once the educational communication satellite center is operational. The estimated completion date is 1989.

In her April 13 response to the council upon being notified of the department's status, Oukrop wrote: "The general operating expense increases and new faculty line will increase the department's budget by more than $50,000."

According to a memo attached to that letter, the department will also pursue other avenues, including working with the KSU Foundation to establish an endowment for the program, making the department a school, obtaining more space and equipment and securing more teaching staff and administrative personnel.

Concerned parents and alumni who have written letters or called have been assured the department will be reapplying for accreditation.

Oukrop said she believed the department would lose some students, but added that immediate steps were being taken to rectify the situation.

The department has mailed a letter to students enrolled in the program and included a section in the department's alumni magazine, Update, to explain the situation. The magazine also will be sent to journalism advisers at Kansas community colleges.

In the area of recruitment, the University will sponsor a hospitality room at the November convention of the Journalism Education Association in Kansas City, Mo.

"We've done virtually no recruiting (in the past) because, quite frankly, we didn't have the faculty to cover the classes we had."

Farming crisis to end, ag economist predicts

By Staff and Wire Reports

Once again Kansas farmers are starting their summer wheat harvests. However, many farmers have a more optimistic outlook on the farm situation than in recent years.

"It looks as if the seeds of recovery have been sown," said Barry Flinchbaugh, professor of agriculture economics and farm analysis.

In the long-run, he said, there are many reasons for optimism. The recent farm troubles may be a thing of the past. Maybe.

Flinchbaugh credits improvements in many factors, including the relaxing of foreign agriculture markets, as a major reason for his optimism.

"Export prices are more competitive," he said. "This is due to the decline of the value of the dollar and to the removal of high price supports. Now agricultural goods can be shipped overseas at whatever price the markets will bear."

Flinchbaugh said the removal of price supports is just one of many aspects of the 1985 farm bill which are helping the sluggish industry.

"The bill also includes high deficiency payments. Now farmers' incomes are not suffering as much."

Overall economic factors have helped the farmers as well.

"Production and energy costs are down," Flinchbaugh said. "Even if energy prices do go back up, they will not return to the days of $35-a-barrel for oil."

Furthermore, farm incomes are up. The U.S. Department of Agriculture predicts a record $48 billion in net farm income for farmers this year. Net farm income for farmers participating in K-State's Kansas Farm Management Association rose an average of $18,000 in 1986. That put association members far beyond 1985's poverty level net income of $4,822.

Combining increased incomes with lower interest rates, Flinchbaugh said he believes farmers will begin to buy new farm equipment. However, they won't be as frivolous this time around.

"Farmers are going to be cautious this time. They were hurt bad. They are not going to go out and buy a bunch of fancy equipment. But much of what they have is depleted. They will buy some new equipment."

Flinchbaugh also said he believes farmers who have enough capital will begin to buy land.

"Land prices have pretty much bottomed out except in isolated cases. I think many farmers will start buying up land."

Sam Brownback, state secretary of agriculture, is also optimistic about the future of the farm economy.

"I'm definitely more optimistic than I was in 1984 and 1985. But there are a lot of variables that could change the recent improvements."

"The livestock industry — a key revenue source in Kansas — must continue trends of good prices and low inputs. Exports must continue to increase. And finally, the current farm policies must remain in place," Brownback said.

All these factors are hard to predict, Brownback said. Furthermore, just because the situation is improving doesn't mean things are good.

"There is a duel level of agriculture," he said. "It depends on how much debt (a farmer) brought into the 1980s. If it is not very much, he will probably experience some good years. If it is a large debt, he is trying to make up a lot of ground."

If all the factors of agriculture production continue to improve as they have recently, both Flinchbaugh and Brownback said they believe the farm economy could be fully resurrected by the late 1990s.

Looking even further ahead, Flinchbaugh said it is possible that by the turn of the century, agricultural production could be free of government control.

Regents approve fee hikes

By SCOTT MILLER
Staff Writer

Due to administration, faculty and student salary increases, the Kansas Board of Regents plan to raise the cost of tuition at the six regent's universities by 3 percent for resident students and by 9 percent for non-resident students for the 1988-89 academic year.

The Regents made the decision at a May 14 meeting in Topeka after the Kansas Legislature had approved salary increases for employees at the universities in its last session, said Marvin Burris, Board of Regents associate director for budget.

Burris said the tuition increases are designed to maintain the current fee-cost ratio of the six Regent's universities.

The fee-cost ratio is the amount students pay in tuition compared with the total cost of education. The state pays the remaining amount.

The decision will affect the base fee, not each university's special line-item fees, which are added each semester. For the fall 1987 semester, the total cost at K-State will be $665.65 for resident undergraduates, $725.65 for resident graduates, $1,750.65 for non-resident undergraduates, and $1,810.65 for non-resident graduates.

For the 1986-87 academic year, the fee-cost ratio for the six universities averaged 26.7 percent. Because of the increasing total cost of education, the increases in tuition in the next two years will drop the fee-cost ratio. Burris said he expected the fee-cost ratio to be 25.9 percent for both the 1987-88 and 1988-89 academic years.

Burris said the fee-cost ratio has been about 25 percent for about 25 years.

S. Korean rioters injure 708 police

SEOUL, South Korea — Crowds chanting "Democracy!" swept through city streets Wednesday, fighting police with firebombs and fists in the largest anti-government protest since President Chun Doo-hwan took power in 1980.

Tens of thousands of protesters in Seoul and at least 21 other cities attacked government buildings and police stations, ripped up sidewalks for ammunition, beat policemen and tore off their uniforms.

National police director Kwon Bok-kyung said Thursday that 708 police officers were injured, 25 of them seriously. He said 24 civilians were injured, but dissident sources said the number was much higher.

Kwon said police arrested 2,392 people in Seoul and 1,439 in provincial areas. He said 16 government buildings and 23 police and other vehicles were burned or destroyed.

The protests continued Thursday in the capital as hundreds of protesters hurled rocks and bricks at police, who fired tear gas and charged demonstrators in an attempt to stop their advance.

Nearly 1,000 demonstrators grouped Thursday behind barricades inside the compound of Myundong Cathedral, South Korea's main Roman Catholic center. Witnesses said reinforced ranks of riot police sealed off the area.

Many onlookers and motorists cheered the protesters, who timed their street demonstrations Wednesday to coincide with a meeting of Chun's political party that endorsed the president's chosen successor.

U.S. government warns governors

WASHINGTON — The director of the Pentagon's National Guard Bureau, in the first such explicit warning, has threatened to cut off money for a state's National Guard if the governor bars troops from being sent to Central America.

Lt. Gen. Herbert R. Temple Jr. included the warning in a letter urging Ohio Gov. Richard F. Celeste to reconsider his refusal to allow Ohio Guardsmen to participate in exercises in Honduras.

Temple's letter was dated June 5 and its delivery to Celeste was reported earlier this week. In releasing the text at the Pentagon on Wednesday, however, National Guard officials cited the funding warning as the first such direct threat to a governor.

They also said the letter made it clear the Reagan administration will not back down in enforcing a new law that strips governors of their authority to block overseas training assignments, even though the law is now under court challenge.

The law, enacted last year, is being challenged by a group of 12 states, led by Minnesota and including Ohio. The law repealed the authority of state governors to block overseas training exercises for their National Guard units unless they were needed for a local emergency.

It was passed at the insistence of Defense Department officials, angered by what they reviewed as the refusal of some governors for political reasons to allow Guardsmen to be sent to Central America to undergo their annual two weeks of active-duty training.

PTL to negotiate tax-exempt status

LYNCHBURG, Va. — The PTL will negotiate with the Internal Revenue Service to avert a threatened loss of tax-exempt status that could destroy the embattled ministry, the Rev. Jerry Falwell said Wednesday.

"Today we had our first long and in-depth look at the finances of the company," Falwell said during a break in an all-day meeting with auditors and lawyers.

"We owe 1,400 creditors $70 million. Twenty-three million is delinquent. We obviously have some problems."

Falwell, who took over the ministry in March from the Rev. Jim Bakker, said PTL could not survive without the tax-exempt status, which the IRS has said is in jeopardy.

"We advised counsel to seek negotiations with the Internal Revenue Service," Falwell said.

Falwell also said federal authorities began an audit of PTL's books on Tuesday and may be looking into allegations of wire fraud and mail fraud.

"It appears that funds apparently were raised under false pretense," he said.

Falwell has said a drive to bolster the ministry raised $8.5 million in May, but he has not released further details of PTL's finances.

Kansas inspectors hunt for asbestos

TOPEKA — Public and private schools in Kansas will have to be re-inspected in the next 16 months to see if they still have potentially dangerous asbestos materials in them.

The state Board of Education was told Wednesday new federal guidelines, expected to take effect this fall, will require the new inspections by October 1988.

The schools were tested four years ago, and most of the dangerous asbestos discovered has been removed. Asbestos has been shown to cause cancer.

They were tested for "friable" asbestos and now will be tested for non-friable asbestos.

Friable asbestos is the type which is easily crumbled, such as that sprayed on ceilings and wrapped around pipes. Non-friable asbestos is that which is used in more solid form, such as in floor tiles.

The new rules are expected to take effect Oct. 17 of this year, with one year for the additional tests to be completed. Then the state must draw up a plan on how it will deal with additional problems discovered related to the asbestos remaining in schools. By July 9, 1989, it must begin implementing that plan.

The testing must be done in all 304 public school districts of the state and in about 150 private schools.

There is no estimate yet of what the new testing will cost, but local school districts will have to pay for it.

Doctors required for amnesty plan

DODGE CITY — A shortage of doctors certified to examine illegal aliens in western Kansas is slowing the applications for a federal amnesty program, the regional director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service said Wednesday.

The agency estimated that 10,000 to 12,000 illegal aliens in western Kansas would be eligible for the program, but only 35 have been granted amnesty in the two months the program has been in effect, regional director Ron Sanders said.

One problem is that until recently, western Kansas applicants for the program had to travel to Wichita or Hutchinson to be examined by a doctor certified by the INS for such examinations, he said.

Professor to head convocation series

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

The Convocation Lecture Series is now operating under new management. Provost Owen Koeppel has announced that the new chairwoman is Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology.

Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture, chaired the committee for the past three years. Flora said a new chairperson is chosen for the Convocation Series every three years by the provost to ensure input from a diverse number of sources.

"The chair should be someone who has served on the committee, which limits the available selection," she said. "It also helps if the applicant is a full professor."

Flora said she was chosen because she publishes a lot, has diverse interests and faithfully attended the committee meetings during her three years as a member.

"The job doesn't take all that much time, but you definitely have to be able to stay on top of it all," she said.

The position does require commitment, Flora said, because it involves arranging schedules and acting as a go-between for the committee and the potential speakers, or the speakers' agents.

Flora described the series as a unique educational experience.

"We are anxious to fulfill what we see as the unique role of the series, that of allowing the whole campus to be intellectually challenged in a wide variety of fields," Flora said.

"Whereas the Landon Lecture Series might bring an active political leader to discuss a particular topic, the Convocation Series might bring a speaker who can shed a scholarly light on the field of politics," she said.

Flora said she hopes students realize what an "incredible opportunity" the series is. Having the chance to interact with and talk to people of different backgrounds is what having an education really is, she said.

"One of the advantages of a university is the chance to hear different ideas," Flora said.

Flora said the committee has three speakers scheduled in fall 1987 and is negotiating with two more possible speakers for spring 1988.

Michael McElroy, Abbott Lawrence Rotch professor of Atmospheric Sciences at Harvard University, will deliver the first lecture at 10:30 a.m. Sept. 9, in McCain Auditorium. McElroy's topic will be "The Greenhouse Effect" and is co-sponsored by the Division of Biology in cooperation with the Elroy Lectureship.

On Sept. 28, Noam Chomsky, who did a large amount of writing opposing the war during the Vietnam era, will discuss "U.S. Foreign Relations" at 1:30 p.m. In addition to being an author, Chomsky is also a linguist who has developed theories about the origins of language.

"We make a real effort to bring speakers from all areas — from the humanities to the physical sciences," Flora said. "We were also interested in having a speaker discuss the (U.S.) Constitution this year, because of the constitutional bicentennial."

Consequently, the third speaker will be Michael Kammen, with the topic, "The Constitution in American Culture." He is scheduled to lecture at 10:30 a.m. Nov. 5.

In April, the Women's Studies program will be hosting a midwestern conference. The committee wanted to have a convocation which could coincide with that event, Flora said, so attempts are being made to interest Adrienne Rich, a feminist scholar and theorist, in speaking.

The second potential convocation lecturer for the spring is Pete Seeger, a folk singer and activist. Flora said Seeger has written songs and sung about the labor, agricultural and peace movements.

"Seeger's voice is beginning to fail — he sang so much for so long — so he cut back on the concerts he will give. He would be an incredible participant in the Series," Flora said. "He has a high level of personal participation and scholarship in pulling together songs from various political movements."

Flora said the pre-convocation forums will continue.

Summer school enrollment up

By The Collegian Staff

According to the University Registrar's office, preliminary on-campus summer enrollment has increased slightly from a year ago.

Following registration on Monday, 4,266 students had enrolled for summer school, an increase of 40 from last year. Gunile Devault, assistant registrar, said the increase was not substantial, but that it was appreciated.

Along with the small increase in enrollment was an increase in per credit hour tuition cost. Last year one credit hour cost $33. Devault said due to inflationary reasons, this year's cost was increased to $35.

According to the Registrar's office final figures last year for the eight-week summer school showed a total of 6,954 students registered.

Accreditation not vital to placement

By SUSAN D. BAIRD
Managing Editor

Potential employers of students in the recently de-accredited Department of Journalism and Mass Communications have stated that the loss of accreditation probably will not affect their hiring procedures.

Vince Coultis, general advertising manager for The Wichita Eagle-Beacon, said the loss should not play a major factor in the quality of education for juniors and seniors in the program.

Coultis said, however, he would question how serious students were about the journalism profession if they entered an unaccredited program.

Yet, Carol Oukrop, department head, said some of the big-name journalism schools such as Boston University, Rutgers and Cornell have chosen not to apply for accreditation. Moreover, the Medill School of Journalism at Northwestern University, Chicago, just recently received its accreditation, she said.

Although the quality of a person's education is important, the individual's attributes are considered even more.

"It's up to the individual. I'm not hiring the university," said Brian Bracco, news director for KMBC-TV in Kansas City, Mo.

"I doubt very seriously whether I would say you don't get a job because you don't come from an accredited school," Bracco said.

"(Students in the journalism schools) shouldn't depend on their academic training for anything," said Jack Casey, operations manager for WHB-AM and KUDL-FM, Kansas City, Mo.

Bob Lida, owner of Lida Advertising Co., Wichita, said when hiring people who have been working, he bypasses the school information and looks at whether they can produce the kind of product for which he is looking.

But when hiring people directly out of college, Lida said, it helps if the person has graduated from a good school with a strong program.

Bracco said it was "nice" to have a college degree and be a graduate from an accredited journalism school, but he has hired people with degrees in English, theater and speech.

A lot of the emphasis on accreditation has to do with prestige, he said.

Journalism schools at Northwestern, the University of Kansas, the University of Missouri-Columbia and Columbia University, New York, have "marvelous" reputations, Bracco said. Over a period of time, they've won contests, maintained the latest facilities and have good professors.

"That (being from a prestigious school) may make you stop a little bit more.... You may take a little bit closer look (at the job applicant)."

"(But) the question is, 'Does that mean the students who are turned out from (non-accredited schools) are not good?'" Bracco said. "No, I don't believe that's the case."

To Bracco, accreditation is like a college degree. "Besides hanging the shingle on the wall," he said, a school's name filters out when it wins awards at competitions.

"(Accreditation) is a mark of distinction and a mark of the quality of the program," said Jeff Funk, managing editor for the Parsons Sun.

Keith Ashley, assistant to the executive editor of The Wichita Eagle-Beacon, said that on the surface, an accredited program historically produces better graduates. Accreditation is important to a program if it means producing a solid, higher-quality employee.

"As a graduate of K-State, I'm disappointed at the loss of prestige to the department and the university," said Funk, a 1975 graduate in journalism and mass communications.

The University's program has much visibility in Kansas, Funk said, and he hopes Wefald follows through with his promise to regain accreditation.

The final evaluation report by the on-site team stated that, "Employers like KSU grads, constantly praise their work ethic, and report that the quality of the graduates is improving."

Furthermore, the report said:

"Alumni hold key posts in U.S. News & World Report, The Washington Post, ABC, AP, Seattle Times, Los Angeles Times, McCall's, Paramount Television Group, Science News, Kansas City Star/Times, and a host of other stations and papers."

For an employer outside of the Midwest, accreditation would show the quality of the program and could possibly make transferring course hours to another journalism school easier, Funk said. But as an employer, he said, the department's loss of accreditation is not a major factor to him.

While the impact of the loss of accreditation may not adversely affect journalism graduates, students currently enrolled in the department will be ineligible for the following:

— The William Randolph Hearst Foundation Journalism Awards Program. The top 10 winners in the program receive scholarship money and the department receives matching funds.

— The Gannett Foundation Grants for research and seminars.

The grand science of summer

This is the season of sunshine, suntans, sunscreens and Sunday sleep-ins. Summer is here and we welcome it back like an old friend returning from a long trip. The trouble is, when an old friend visits we can't spend all our time with him. We still have schedules to meet, whether they include classes, a job or both. However, the world of science has given us a few options that will allow us more time with our old friend summer.

Microwave it. Science's greatest gift to mankind isn't a cure for a disease or even the exploration of outer space. Indeed, the ability to zap our favorite foods — bombard them with onrushing molecules — far outweighs an atmospheric test of Jupiter or a syringe of polio vaccine. The ability to have dinner in a minute keeps us in almost constant contact with our old friend summer.

Entertaining our old friend no longer requires heating up the kitchen and, in turn, the entire apartment. Nor does it require a meal catered by Oscar Mayer and Fritos. Today, science has seen to it that we, as hosts of summer, can easily prepare anything from the simple to the succulent just by pressing a few heat-sensitive buttons.

At the beep it will be summer. Pile it. The science of mathematics uses vertical space to guarantee our old friend's stay will be a long and pleasant one. How? Let's gaze over the top of our office desk or stand in the doorway to our apartment. If we see a scattering of loose papers or a dense underbrush of sports sections then we can use vertical space.

GARY LEFFLER

By piling it, we turn that tangled mess of newspapers into rectangular bales of information. These bales multiply geometrically as we spend more time entertaining our friend and less time picking up after him. They begin to include other parallelograms such as magazines, tabloids, junk mail (especially the discount store fliers) and that December TV Guide we've been meaning to throw away since Easter.

At work, time will no longer drag on as we gaze outside only to see our old friend staring back, his face pressed against the window. By piling our clutter of loose papers we will create an image of organization and accomplishment. This optical illusion handily diverts our superior's attention as our friend beckons us to the lake one more time. Take a memo: It's summer.

Fill it. The concept of volume is vital when our old friend visits. We must guarantee our refrigerator volume is utilized to its fullest potential — 52 percent beverages (in six- or 12-pack groupings), 23 percent lunchmeats, 16 percent containerized leftovers from previous semesters and 9 percent dairy products (i.e. milk to cottage cheese to hard block cheese and the all quasi-food between these stages). Consult a biology textbook to classify any fungi that do not fit in the above categories.

Once our refrigerator is operating at maximum efficiency, we then fill gasoline tanks and battery compartments on portable radios. This is significant because physics deems that an object in motion stays in motion and it's no different for our friend. If we spend too much time in the local convenience store we'll soon discover our friend has left us. Suddenly, we'll be standing in front of the Pepsi display, dumbfounded, as our friend waves goodbye — off to spend a long vacation in Rio.

Yes, science has made an unforgettable visit from our old friend summer easy to obtain, so long as we follow some basic rules. Simply say, "Fill 'er up, please, with premium, high-performance summer. Oh, and check the wiper fluid."

Reagan's AIDS policy violates human rights

Something needs to be done about the AIDS pandemic, but Ronald Reagan's program announced by Attorney General Edwin Meese III on Tuesday is not the answer. The new program turns a medical issue into a political one.

This policy entails mandatory AIDS testing for aliens applying for visas or amnesty and testing of federal prisoners a month before they are scheduled to go on parole. If tested positive, the immigrant would be denied entrance to the United States and test results would be sent to the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Prisoners who test positive could be denied parole and their test results would be sent to parole and police officers.

This policy is based on fear and ignorance because the only way an AIDS victim can infect others is by blood like sharing a hypodermic needle or by sexual contact — not by just being around him. Therefore, it is highly unlikely that a police or parole officer or even someone in the same room as the victim could be exposed to the disease.

Furthermore, this policy infringes upon the rights of these people. Although aliens do not have constitutional rights, they do have human rights, and if they were to come to this country specifically for the treatment of AIDS, they couldn't get it. Denying prisoners parole because of AIDS seems to make having the disease a crime in itself, and sending them back to prison contributes to the overcrowding problem.

Reagan and Meese seem to have done well for themselves. In order to offend as few voters as possible, they have aimed their new AIDS policy toward the two groups whose constitutional rights have, traditionally, been shown the least amount of consideration by most of the American public.

There can be no denial that AIDS is a serious problem which our society needs to control and, eventually, to eliminate. However, in our panic, we forget that since AIDS is a disease, the battle to control it is a medical, rather than a political one. Instead of formulating new policies which will infringe upon the human rights of specific groups, our energies should be funneled into research on how to find a cure and a vaccine for this deadly disease.

Media overlook ethical quirks

Since Gary Hart ended his presidential campaign there has been a surge of commentary concerning the proper role of the media in a presidential election. Under normal circumstances, we wouldn't expect the Miami Herald to spy on people, nor to report on alleged sexual misconduct. The Herald argued, however, that Hart's situation no longer constituted normal circumstances and that the public has a right to know about a front runner's character, including his weekends in Bimini.

But arguably, it was the media itself, and not Hart's activities that forced him to withdraw from the race. I say arguably, because that is, in fact, what I would argue. If the major media were to scrutinize other campaigns the way it did Hart's, there would probably be a few more presidential contenders struggling to explain their actions.

For example, in the May 2 issue of the Nation, David Corn calls into question the honesty of presidential hopeful Rep. Richard Gephardt. It seems the Effective Government Committee, a political action committee chaired by Gephardt, raised money ostensibly to support Democratic Congressional candidates.

But of the $1 million raised, only $63,597.32 was actually given to fellow Democrats; the remainder was used for Gephardt's travel, including frequent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, and for the salaries and office expenses of the people who now run his presidential campaign.

Corn writes, "Gephardt's use of his PAC as a cover for a pre-announcement campaign for the Democratic nomination may be legal, but it is surely not what Congress intended when it passed the 1971 Federal Election Campaign Act which restricts contributions to Federal candidates and the amount presidential contenders can spend."

Corn claims Gephardt is not alone in this type of fund raising; he is simply the worst among the Democrats. Other Democratic contenders raising money through multi-candidate PACs and then using it for their own campaigns include Joseph Biden and Bruce Babbitt, as well as George Bush, Robert Dole and Jack Kemp in the Republican Party. In fact, of the $10.4 million raised by multi-candidate PACs associated with Bush, Dole and Kemp only $1.2 million was actually given to other Republican party candidates.

There are a number of interesting matters concerning other candidates as well. Although the major media have insinuated a number of things concerning George Bush, they have largely overlooked some of the more specific incidents that might be of interest. In the May issue of the Progressive, Allan Nairn cites evidence suggesting Bush and his staff were more aware of the Contra supply effort than Bush has admitted.

Although Bush denies discussing the Contra supply operation with ex-CIA agent Felix Rodriguez, records indicate Rodriguez held repeated phone conversations with Bush's staff and met with Bush three times during the period when Rodriguez was involved in the apparently illegal arms shipments. Bush's office also received reports on the progress of the shipments.

Further questions might be raised about Bush's honesty after he backed President Reagan's claims that the U.S. government was dealing with Iranian "moderates." In fact, Bush had been informed some months earlier by a memo from an Israeli official that the Americans were dealing with "the most radical elements" in Iran.

There are also a few unanswered questions about presidential hopeful Sen. Robert Dole. For starters, there is Dole's support for the Mozambiquan terrorist group Renamo. Renamo, which was originally set up by Rhodesia and is now supported by South Africa, regularly attacks medical clinics and has a habit of capturing peasants and cutting off their ears.

So brutal are Renamo's tactics that Britain's conservative Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has increased British aid to Mozambique to $25 million. Even President Reagan agreed in 1985 to meet with Samora Machel, the late president of Mozambique, despite the fact that Machel openly espoused socialism. But Dole and 27 other senators are currently trying to change U.S. policy to support Renamo terrorists.

Further, there are questions about the involvement of Dole's wife, Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole, in the still emerging Wedtech scandal. In 1982, Henry Zuniga, an aide in Elizabeth Dole's public liaison office, allegedly lobbied illegally for a New York defense contractor. True, Dole's activities are not necessarily related to his wife's, but that didn't stop media speculation about bribery and grand larceny charges against the husband of 1984 Democratic vice presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro.

Finally, we might question the honesty of the Rev. Pat Robertson. According to former congressman Paul McClosky Jr., who in 1951 was on a ship headed toward the Korean front, then-2nd Lt. Robertson, who was on the same ship, called his father (Sen. A. Willis Robertson) who then secured a non-combat position for Pat.

Robertson doesn't deny getting off the ship in Tokyo, but he does deny his father pulled Pentagon strings for him, as well as another of McClosky's recollections — that Robertson later worked in Korea as a liquor officer.

Why has the Nation and not the CBS Evening News, been one of the few media sources to report on the questionable ethics of Gephardt's PAC? Why have we not heard more about the activities of Elizabeth Dole, or her husband's support for terrorism in Mozambique? Why is it necessary to go to the Progressive to get important information on George Bush's role in the Contra war? And why has the press not hounded Pat Robertson a little more about his military record?

If the major media want to claim the right to probe the lives of high public officials, then perhaps they should take themselves more seriously and actually do so.

Accreditation problem renders mixed results

Shock waves went through the halls of Kedzie when students and faculty heard the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications had lost its accreditation.

The two main reasons for denial were an inadequate budget and noncompliance with the curriculum guidelines of the Accrediting Council on Education in Journalism and Mass Communications.

Fortunately, the University administration has heard the agonized cry for help and promptly responded to the situation.

Not only has President Jon Wefald assured the department it will receive two substantial budget increases over the next two years, two new tenure tract positions within the journalism and mass communications faculty will be established in fall 1988.

Moreover, another tenured position will be created in radio and television faculty when the education communication satellite center begins operations after its scheduled completion in 1989.

The department is also taking strong steps toward correcting the problem by changing the curriculum requirements to meet accreditation standards. Stressing recruitment and informing current students and alumni of the situation are also positive steps.

Potential regional employers to believe this will not drastically change their opinion of K-State graduates or the program.

Although accreditation may signify a strong journalism program, most employers believe it is the individual's experience and ability that counts when hiring.

But all news is not rosy.

Students will not be able to compete in a prestigious journalism scholarship program, and the department is ineligible for research and seminar grants from the Gannett Foundation.

Even more distressing is the news that three other problems — low faculty scholarship, inadequate internship supervision and failure to pursue affirmative action — are mainly weaknesses within the program itself.

Although some cannot see the need for reapplying in spring 1988, accreditation is a worthy goal. It is not merely a "shingle" to hang on the wall but a mark of excellence.

True, this loss is not the end of the world. But it certainly indicates a decline in quality that needs to be rectified immediately.

S. Africa restores security measures

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — President P.W. Botha said Wednesday he had renewed a national state of emergency that during the past year has given police wide powers to crack down on people protesting apartheid.

"Considering the safety of the public and the maintenance of public order, I have decided to proclaim a state of emergency once more in the whole of the republic, including the self-governing national states (black tribal homelands)," Botha told Parliament in a speech he repeated on national television. "I have already signed the documents in this connection."

Botha's June 12, 1986 state-of-emergency decree and a series of related regulations empowering police to restrict freedom of speech, press and assembly were due to expire at midnight Thursday. The new decree legally extends the state of emergency for up to a year.

When Botha declared the emergency last year, he cited statistics on increases in public violence. More than 20,000 people have been detained without charge since then, and the government indicated earlier this month that just over 3,000 were still being held.

The Detainees Parents Support Committee reported a few hours before Botha's Parliament speech that a large number of black community leaders had been released from detention Wednesday without explanation.

Some legal experts said that anyone detained under the expiring emergency would have to be released, but that they could be immediately detained again and did not necessarily have to be formally freed.

Many provisions of the emergency regulations have been challenged in court.

University fills 3 administrative posts

KIM ZOLLMAN
Staff Writer

While three of five administrative positions have been filled at K-State, the provost and Union director positions still need to be filled.

Edward D. Rice has been appointed general manager of Physical Facilities, Jerre Fercho has been appointed to director of Personnel Services, and Michael Barber will be the first director of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

Rice, director of the physical plant at Montana State at Bozeman and president of the Rocky Mountain chapter of the Association of Physical Plant Administrators, will begin his duties June 22. He is replacing Fred Ferguson who retired June 1.

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said Rice, "will display both strength and fairness in dealing with his staff and with different department heads on campus."

Rice's duties will be directing and maintaining support of the University's facilities with a staff of 300 employees, a base budget of $12 million and a special maintenance budget of $700,000. In addition, buildings, grounds, utilities, postal service and car pool are under his jurisdiction.

Fercho, director of personnel at North Dakota State University, Fargo, will begin work June 18. He replaces Darwin Liverance, who left Feb. 16 to take a similar position at Auburn University in Montgomery, Ala.

Miller said Fercho, "gets out to meet the employees in order to determine what is happening in the work area."

Fercho's responsibilities for K-State's personnel program include employment, position management services, staff training and development, employee benefits and records, employee relations and information management.

Barber, director of Public Assembly Facilities at Cajon Dome in Lafayette, La., will replace acting director Charles Hein, director of Facilities Planning, as director of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum starting June 18.

Barber will be responsible for the total operation of the coliseum, including promotions, finances, employment, developing contacts with agencies, negotiating contracts with talent agencies and assisting campus organizations and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to maximize the building's use.

A search committee will be organized in several weeks to find a replacement for Provost Owen Koeppel, who will retire July 1. The replacement should take office in early 1988. Jim Kaufman, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, will serve as acting provost.

Walt Smith, former Union director, retired from the position May 17. The search committee had narrowed the field to two candidates, and preferred one over the other, said William Sutton, vice president for education and student services. But the candidate did not accept the position. Since the committee did not want to accept the other candidate by default, the search process was renewed.

ELIGIBILITY FOR CARE AT LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER

1. Health fees are established upon the recommendation of the Student Senate with approval by the Board of Regents.
2. All students who are enrolled and attending classes during a regular semester or summer session who have paid health fees are eligible for care.
3. Those enrolled in Special Courses, for varying periods of time, who have made previous arrangements for health care coverage at Lafene are eligible for care. (Lists of these students must be furnished prior to being seen at Lafene.)
4. Only students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene; however, they must pay the spouse fee within 10 days of the time their own health fees are paid. (Children cannot be seen.)
5. Emergency care, prior to referral, will be given anyone who comes in.
6. Students enrolled in 6 hours or less, electing not to pay the health fee during the Fall or Spring semesters, who wish to be seen, will be charged $20 for each office visit. This charge continues until the full health fee has been exceeded, then that student will be afforded the same privileges as the regular fee paying student for the remainder of that semester.
7. Students who were enrolled in the Spring and pre-enrolled for the Fall semester but not attending summer school may pay $15 and be eligible for care during the summer. This fee may be paid within 30 days prior to summer registration and ends the day classes begin. A late fee of $20 will be accepted for the remainder of the summer.
8. Health fees are good until 12 o'clock the night the next semester begins.

NOTE: In addition to the above mentioned fees, there are minimal charges for certain supplies and services and the charges are subject to change without prior notice.

Summer's 'worst': Ernest's experience 'embarrasses' fans

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reviewer

Here it is, folks — the worst movie of the summer. Only a keen sense of sportsmanship, and my procrastination in seeing Ishtar, keeps me from labeling it the worst movie of the YEAR.

Film Review

"Ernest Goes to Camp," rated PG, embarrasses its audience in two ways. Not only does the audience feel like a pack of foolish lemmings for paying to see the movie, but it feels short-changed for missing out on a movie career. Any non-English-speaking half-wit can be twice as funny as anyone in this movie.

The story revolves around our friendly geek Ernest P. Worrel, (Jim Varney) who is best known for sticking his unpleasant mug on our television screens and saying, "Hey Vern."

Now he is a fix-it man at a summer camp. His ambition is to become a camp counselor in order to mold "young minds into a focused, world view." This is the funniest line in the movie, and it is also in the commercial. If you have seen it, you have already used up your laugh.

Worrel gets his chance to mold when six, reform-school "tough-guys" get to camp through a second-chance program. He spends the rest of the movie gaining their respect and losing the audience's.

As if that plot was not complex enough (that's called sarcasm, folks), the camp is built on valuable mineral deposits. John Vernon (Dean Wormer in "Animal House") plays an evil corporate boss who is trying to swindle the Indian owner of the camp into selling the land on which it is built. Ironically, the Indian is an unfunny, non-English-speaking full-wit.

Besides the predictable outcome, the main problem with this film is that it is not funny. It is stupid. Not creatively stupid, like Monty Python works, but predictably stupid like Benny Hill kitsch. The are no funny lines, and the scenes and situations are terribly childish.

However, there is a scene that makes laughter inevitable. Worrel and the boys are catapulting snapping turtles at the big, bad construction workers. As the turtles float down wearing little, turtle parachutes, they sink their teeth into the workmen.

The scene is so ridiculous that laughing it off is the only way to prevent slitting your wrist in shame and anger. It was during this scene that a man behind me whispered to the woman next to him, "Oh jeez, Helen, we shoulda stayed home and played Yahtzee."

The movie also relies too heavily on the many ways Varney can comfort his rubbery face. This gets old fast.

The characters are very weak and, in keeping with the plot, very predictable. Yes, we get to see a soft side to Worrel as he sings a Kermit-the-frog-like song about having no friends, but that evokes little compassion from a cheated audience.

In fact, the movie could be mistaken for a convention of commercial characters. Besides Ernest, there is the fat guy who pushes heat pumps (Gailard Sartain), and the Indian who cried at the sight of our nation's pollution (Iron Eyes Cody). He must have bawled when he saw the opening of this garbage. The characters are fine for 15- and 30-second commercials. But they hardly merit roles in full-length films.

I can only think of one reason, besides masochism, for anyone to go see this movie — kids. The humor is as corny as that of a joke told by any 6-year-old child. This is a corny movie and anyone under 12 might like it. Perhaps "Ernest Goes to Camp" should have been rated PG-13; no one over 13 will be admitted.

Let it be said that the movie does aspire to be more than funny. It attempts to urge humanity not to let industry devour nature, as well as show the sin of swindling Indians out of land. But because the movie can't be taken as a serious comedy, the environmentalist overtones become preachy. As for the swindling part, the movie is about a century too late.

It may seem like I'm being harsh on the movie, and I am. But it is justified. I didn't expect to see a movie of the quality of "Pee Wee's Great Adventure." I would have felt lucky if it had even approached the humorous tackiness of "Meatballs" (the king of summer camp movies). But "Ernest" is insulting.

Therefore, I suggest that everyone skip "Ernest." In a few months it will die quietly on the dusty shelves of video stores across the country. If you want to take the kids to a movie, wait for "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," which is due out later this summer. In the meantime, teach the kids how to play Yahtzee.

The Kingsmen kicked off this year's Arts in the Park schedule Saturday at City Park to a crowd of more than 4,000 people. Concerts will continue in City Park through July 24. Some 14 major shows will be in Manhattan this summer including rock, jazz, gospel and country programs.

Art fans headed for hot summer in the city

Summer is not yet officially here, but summer fun has already begun in the park.

The sounds of The Kingsmen began the Arts in the Park program last Saturday. Concerts will continue in City Park through July 24.

Don Cukjati, Arts in the Park director, said he has high expectations for this season.

"I think we're going to have a fantastic program," he said. "The shows this season are bigger than ever in the history of the program."

Cukjati said 14 major shows will be in Manhattan this summer plus some of the best groups from this area. Due to the variety of the performers, he said, no one program will be highlighted.

"We're going to have, for example, rock, jazz, gospel and country," Cukjati said. "The groups will represent different forms of music, and each is excellent in its own right."

Another aspect of the Arts in the Park program is the Summer in the City series. Cukjati said the program is designed as a lunchbag activity where people can enjoy their lunches and watch a variety of artists.

Aggieville's Triangle Park will be the site of a performance Fridays from noon to 1 p.m., while the Courthouse Plaza downtown will be the setting every Saturday from noon to 1 p.m. Children's activities such as a puppet theater and arts and crafts workshops will be at both locations.

Cukjati said the final Summer in the City performance will be Aug. 1, but the series will continue through the first part of October under the title Indian Summer in the City. Indian Summer programs will be at 8 p.m. Thursdays and 1 p.m. Fridays.

"Summer in the City is a very promising program, and I think we're going to continue it next year," he said.

One special program is a new concept for Arts in the Park, Cukjati said. Bluegrass Day on Saturday, June 20, will begin with a noon concert and conclude with a barbecue feast and bluegrass concert that evening.

In conjunction with the Summer in the City program, Wheatland Express, a bluegrass band, will perform at noon in the Courtyard Plaza. Beginning at 1:30 p.m. and continuing throughout the afternoon will be performances on the Arts in the Park stage interspersed with bluegrass workshops.

Cukjati said there has never been a whole day dedicated to one form of music before.

"We want to invite everyone to bring their guitars and jam," he said. "There will be workshops on banjo and guitar technique, including flat-top and finger pickin'."

As part of another special program, 100 children have been cast to perform the musical "Grease" July 17, 18 and 19 for the Children's Theater production, Cukjati said. Rehearsals with professional instructors have already begun.

All Arts in the Park performances are free, except for the Children's Theater production.

K-State voices ring throughout Swiss Alps

"The Sound of Music," the popular Rodgers and Hammerstein musical, was set in Austria. However, the sound of American music could be heard in Switzerland for 10 days, as the K-State Choir toured through Montreaux, Lugano, St. Moritz and Lucerne.

The choir, under the direction of Rod Walker, professor of music, left May 21 and returned June 1. The main performance was at the St. Moritz Music Festival. Walker said the festival was made up of five American choirs and one Canadian choir. The rest of the concerts were performed for native audiences; however, Walker said the choir concentrated on singing American music.

"Foreign audiences like to hear Americans do American music," said Walker. "We can perform our music better than anybody else, just like they can perform their music better than anybody else."

Walker said the choir toured Germany and Austria two years ago. On that trip, a Bach piece was performed. He said the audience listened politely and seemed interested in hearing an American interpretation, but the music was very familiar to them, so "we couldn't do it any better."

Dan Beggs, senior in pre-medicine, said the audience seemed to like hearing the American music, even when they didn't speak English.

"The audiences seemed to be so much more musically educated. They really appreciated the music, and when we got a standing ovation, it felt sincere," he said. "When you sing for an audience of a different culture, the emotion and the intensity have to be that much greater. We had to make the music feel like it was supposed to sound."

The concert settings were also unfamiliar. Walker said the choir would perform in halls that varied in size from a large room to a cathedral. Consequently, every hall had different acoustical features, and the choir needed to be able to adapt to every setting, with little or no advance preparation.

Leslie Ott, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education, said the choir provided the musical portions of a Catholic mass in Montreaux.

"We performed the Kyrie, (Lord have mercy), Agnus Dei, (Lamb of God) and Gloria, (Glory), portions of the mass," Ott said. "It was neat to be able to go and fit right into their service. Music really is an international language."

Beggs said the choir also performed in what would be the equivalent of a retirement home.

"It looked like anything you'd see here, except it was bigger and the people didn't speak English."

The fact that the students didn't speak the same language as the people they were performing for didn't seem to bother them.

"Everything is different. Traveling in countries where English is spoken makes our operations easier," Walker said, "but the most valuable experiences come from learning how to communicate with people who don't speak the same language."

The K-State Choir travels overseas every two years, which is the most often the students can afford the cost. This year's trip cost $1,950 for each student. Walker said the choir has been invited to Australia, and he has been investigating the possibilities of taking that trip in two years.

"Again, it comes down to cost. A trip to Australia would be more expensive, but it would be a good experience. The trip would be in conjunction with choirs from several other universities, and would include New Zealand and Tasmania, if possible. Also, the students would have homestays — the chance to stay in native homes — which would decrease the cost and increase the human value of the trip," he said.

In addition to performing, the students had free time to spend sightseeing. Ott found value just in being in a different country.

"The biggest thing in the trip, for me, was to be up in the Alps, on top of the world, looking down, so far from home," Ott said. "You can't find that feeling in the States, not even in Colorado."

Mark Kahler, senior in radio and television, found that traveling can Cars, cops, criminals make Murphy sequel 'top-heavy'

By ANDRE KELLY
Collegian Reviewer

If you've seen it, then you already know that despite its heavy-handed hype, "Beverly Hills Cop II" is not what it seems.

Film Review

Everybody's favorite funky cop, Axel Foley, is back and so is the rest of his gang. This time, instead of Victor Mateland and Co., he's up against the 6-foot-plus Brigitte Nielsen and her nasty boss, the Alphabet Killer.

The story opens with Foley stepping out in a Brooks Brothers original, hopping into a Lamborghini and blazing off to his usual Detroit antics. He's still grating his captain's nerves, going over budget with department funds and wise-cracking with the boys in the squad-room.

All this stops when he finds out that there's trouble in Beverly Hills and off he goes to save the day.

He's reunited with the team of Taggart and Rosewood and off they go collecting clues, rummaging through sleazy bars, and fast-talking their way into exclusive Beverly Hills establishments (and homes as well.) Murphy almost pulls this off before you can say, "Hey, haven't we seen this before?"

No one can accuse this flick of under-doing it. There are enough explosions, car chases and people getting blown away to make 007 jealous — speaking of which, since when has Axel been able to outrun bullets, short-circuit alarm systems, and override computers? This isn't Murphy, this is McGyver.

The film even exceeds its T/A quotient with its thrown-in Hugh Hefner party complete with more boobs than Irangate.

A major plus for the film is that it expands more on the detective team of Taggart and Rosewood. And even though Serge (Bronson Pinchot) is completely left out, it does include two Letterman comic regulars Paul Reiser (Axel's Detroit sidekick) and the obnoxious Gilbert Gottfried. They even managed to squeeze in Murphy's protegee/newcomer Chris Rock.

However, sticking an Amazon like Brigitte Nielsen in the cast and then not using her has got to be the biggest waste of a villain since Tom Cruise's "Legend."

Nielsen is in the Grace Jones class of femme fatales, but the promos lead you to think she's at least half of the film when, in fact, she's not. With this type of cop-comedy, you only need one criminal (and Nielsen would have done nicely) but no, they had to go and add a cigarette-

Kruger molds future champs

By JEFF RAPP
Staff Writer

The temporary bleachers have been taken down, the wooden floor has been removed and the screaming fans are absent, but there is still plenty of basketball action in Ahearn Field House this month.

All of the activity in Ahearn can be attributed to K-State coach Lon Kruger's basketball camp, which gives boys from grade school to high school a chance to learn the game of basketball from Kruger and his assistants.

In addition to brushing up on their skills, the campers are being positively exposed to the K-State campus. Kruger said that's important, too.

"It's a great exposure for Kansas State University," he said. "Every time we can get young people on campus and ensure that they have a good time, then I think that enhances our chances to get them back here as students in the future."

Kruger said he and his staff are aiming to give the campers an optimum learning experience.

"With the kids, we have two objectives going into camp," Kruger said. "We want them to learn the correct way to perform various skills related to basketball, and we want them to have a good time."

"I think the camp experience should be a positive experience, so we try to structure our drills and structure our sessions in a way where they can enjoy the competition and feel good about meeting other campers and about competing with them," he added.

Generally speaking, he said this camp is a continuation of one that has been in operation at K-State for many years.

"Most universities have a summer basketball camp, and they've had camps at Kansas State for about the last 25 to 30 years, so it's just actually a continuation and just something that's part of the basketball program."

Kruger assisted with basketball camps at K-State as a graduate assistant and an assistant coach when Jack Hartman was head coach.

Some of the campers here this summer might some day take a step up to the Wildcat basketball program, Kruger said.

"There's always that potential," he said. "Many times when you're getting a large number of basketball players together there's a chance they might develop and be a future prospect of Kansas State."

"That's not the purpose of camp, but many times it's something that comes from camp. Steve Alford at Indiana, for instance, went to Bobby Knight's camp. I think, since he was 8 years old," Kruger said.

Exposure to a major university for future basketball players is also a plus for the talented campers.

"It gives the campers with more ability who might have the potential to play college basketball a good opportunity to go to a university and get to know the campus and the coaching staff a little bit," he said.

"It gives them a chance to find out about it on-site. I think that's the best way to find out about a university and a coaching staff."

Wildcat earns chance to play for Cardinals

By The Collegian Staff

After a stellar senior year, K-State's Mike Hinkle was drafted by the St. Louis Cardinals baseball team Tuesday.

Upon being drafted Hinkle, senior in accounting, said it was a goal finally accomplished.

"It was a tremendous thrill," Hinkle said of his being drafted. "I thought I had a chance of making it as an outfielder earlier, but then I realized my size (5-10, 163 pounds), speed and power weren't that great and that might keep me from being an outfielder."

After the season ended, the 'Cats' starting centerfielder and pitcher topped the list of four Wildcat baseball players who received post-season honors from the Big Eight Conference.

Hinkle was named to the first team as a utility player. His selection marked the first time a K-State player had been named to the first team since Tom Smith was chosen as starting pitcher in 1985.

Hinkle was 5-3 for the 'Cats during his senior campaign on the mound with a 3.00 ERA. He compiled 38 strikeouts and 17 walks in 60.3 innings of work. At the plate, Hinkle had an average of .376 with 17 extra-base hits, including eight home runs.

In addition to Hinkle's All-Big Eight honor, Jeff Turtle was named to the second team as a designated hitter. Otto Kaifes and Marty Darnell were honorable mention choices.

Hinkle was also tabbed as a second team academic All-America by the GTE-CoSIDA Academic All-America Committee. Hinkle was selected to the team as an outfielder. Hinkle attained a 3.48 grade point average in accounting.

Joining Hinkle from K-State were Anne Stadler and Jacque Struckhoff from the women's track team. Stadler and Struckhoff were selected to the District VII All-America.

Wednesday, Hinkle reported to Erie, Pa., where he will join the Cardinals Class A team which will begin its season Wednesday.

'Terps' former mentor: 'drug both good, bad'

By The Associated Press

COLLEGE PARK, Md. — Former University of Maryland basketball coach Lefty Driesell says his remarks that cocaine can enhance the performance of athletes have been misinterpreted.

Driesell, who resigned under pressure last fall following the cocaine-induced death of Maryland basketball star Len Bias, said he never intended to imply he knew of any basketball players who used recreational drugs to help them perform better, nor to say that cocaine is good or helpful in the long run for an athlete.

Driesell said Sunday at a conference on drugs in sports at the University of Rhode Island that research he did 30 years ago led him to believe that cocaine can help athletic performance. He noted that four of the top players in Atlantic Coast Conference history — John Lucas of Maryland, David Thompson of North Carolina State and Walter Davis and Phil Ford of North Carolina — were admitted drug users.

"I'm a firm believer that, if you know how to use cocaine and use it properly, it can make you play better...I really believe cocaine can be performance-enhancing," Driesell said.

On Tuesday, Driesell told The Baltimore Sun, "I am violently opposed to the use of cocaine. It is highly toxic and usually becomes addictive. That was the conclusion of my study. But during the study, I was told that cocaine was a performance enhancer, that it might help for a night — but that it would do more harm than good in the long run."

"Why did the NCAA test everybody for drugs during the recent basketball tournament?" he continued. "I don't think they tested to prevent use of cocaine for social reasons. They did it because it enhances a player's performance. That's the same reason they test for drugs at the Olympics."

Some members of the athletic community lashed out at his comments.

Ohio State basketball Coach Gary Williams said the four players Driesell mentioned were great, "but they didn't have to have any drug to play like they did in their primes. Every one was torn down by using cocaine."

"You can die. Three great players — Bias, Don Rogers (of the NFL's Cleveland Browns) and now that kid at Texas-El Paso (basketball player Jeep Jackson) — have died in the last year...I can't believe Lefty could say it is performance enhancing."

Outdoor sports easy to find during long summer months

Well, it's finally summertime.

Some people find themselves in summer school trying to keep the old GPA up, while others find themselves either getting further ahead in school or just trying to catch up. Others find themselves trying to make enough money for next fall.

If there is some spare time in your schedule, try catching a ball game or two. Or if that isn't enough, maybe a swim meet would "wet" your appetite. Maybe a tennis tournament is your favorite serving.

Manhattan has a lot going on this summer in baseball. The local American Legion 17ers baseball team plays all its games at Frank Myers Field, home of the K-State Wildcats. During the weekend of July 2-5, the 17ers will be hosting the Firecracker Tournament. Then, at the end of the season, if they make it to the state tournament, they will be playing in their own backyard. The

BILL LANG
Sports Columnist

Legion baseball state tournament also will be played Aug. 8-11 at Frank Myers Field.

If you're still sitting there saying to yourself that the Legion team and the state tournament isn't enough, then get yourself set for the week of Aug. 7-12.

The National Baseball Congress will be coming to town when Manhattan hosts the NBC World Series at CiCo Park. It's one of the biggest events in a Little Leaguer's summer.

There is also — on any given night — a softball game going on, where players like yours truly try to emulate the motions of the major league players.

The Manhattan Marlins, the local swimming club, will be hosting their meet at the City Park swimming pool. About 20 teams from around the Big Eight area will be competing in the event.

If tennis is your thing, then rush down to the Manhattan Recreation Department and enter the Lil' Apple Tennis Tournament. The tournament will be taking place at tennis courts around Manhattan the weekend of June 20-21.

And finally let's not forget that just down I-70 is Kansas City and the Royals, who happen to be hanging onto first place by a thread.

So if you're looking for an excuse this summer to get away from work or summer school or you're just needing something to do for a few hours, get out and find a ball game, a tennis match or a pool.

Twins sweep Royals in series

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Gene Larkin's one-out, 10th-inning single scored Greg Gagne from second Wednesday night, lifting the Minnesota Twins to a 4-3 victory over Kansas City and moving them into first place ahead of the Royals.

Jeff Reardon, 3-4, pitched two scoreless innings of relief for the victory.

The three-game series sweep gave Minnesota a five-game winning streak for the first time in two years.

A bases-loaded error by Royals first baseman Steve Balboni in the eighth inning allowed the Twins to rally from a three-run deficit and tie the game.

Charlie Leibrandt took a two-hitter into the eighth before getting into trouble. Leibrandt allowed a one-out single by Mark Davidson and two-out walks to Dan Gladden and pinch-hitter Tim Laudner to load the bases.

Reliever Dan Quisenberry entered and got Kirby Puckett to ground to first, but the ball hit Balboni in the midsection and caromed into short right field. Davidson and Gladden scored easily and pinch-runner Gagne beat right fielder Danny Tartabull's throw to the plate.

Twins starter Bert Blyleven struck out nine over eight innings but was victimized by speedy Willie Wilson and by his own propensity for giving up homers.

Wilson led off the game with a single, stole second, went to third on catcher Sal Butera's throwing error and scored on Jorge Orta's two-out double.

In the third, Wilson singled, stole second and scored when Blyleven's pickoff attempt sailed into center field.

Jackson made it 3-0 in the fifth inning with his 12th homer of the year, a drive to straightaway center estimated at 466 feet.

Richmond awarded chance to play on elite U.S. team

By The Collegian Staff

K-State forward Mitch Richmond, a junior in social science, has been selected by the Amateur Basketball Association of the United States as one of 20 finalists who will compete for a spot on the U.S. team that will compete in the 1987 World University Games in Zagreb, Yugoslavia, July 8-23.

The USA Select Team, which comprises 12 players, will be headed by coach Mike Krzyzewski of Duke University.

Krzyzewski will be assisted by Tom Miller of the University of Colorado and Ron Slaymaker of Emporia State University.

Training sessions will begin on June 21 at Duke University. An exhibition game against an Atlantic Coast Conference All-Star team will be scheduled during the training camp.

Richmond, a second team All-Big Eight choice this past season, finished as the second leading scorer and rebounder for the Wildcats. Richmond is a native of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., averaging 18.6 points and 5.7 rebounds a game for the 'Cats.

Before playing at K-State, Richmond earned first-team Junior College All-America honors for the 1985-86 season at Moberly (Mo.) Junior College. Under present K-State assistant coach Dana Altman. Also joining Richmond in the journey from Moberly was 6-7 forward Charles Bledsoe, who also started for the 'Cats last year.

Honors are nothing new to Richmond. During his two seasons at Moberly he was a First Team Junior College All-American for the 1985-86 season and was selected as the Region XVI Player of the Year.

Quake rocks Midwest states

By The Associated Press

A strong earthquake rattled parts of nine Midwestern states from Missouri to West Virginia on Wednesday evening, shaking buildings in downtown Milwaukee, Chicago and Detroit.

There were no immediate reports of injuries or damage.

"We've had a pretty strong earthquake," reported Bruce Presgrave of the National Earthquake Information Center of the U.S. Geological Survey in Golden, Colo. "We're still working it. We don't have a magnitude yet but apparently it was felt over a pretty wide area in the Midwest."

The quake was felt in Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Kentucky and West Virginia.

"We haven't gotten any official information, but we felt it here," said Dennis Dixon, a National Weather Service forecaster in Ann Arbor, about 40 miles west of Detroit.

"I was sitting here at the (computer) screen and things started moving," he said.

Dixon said it occurred about 7:50 p.m. and continued for several minutes. In Illinois, the earthquake was felt as far north as Chicago, and as far south as the St. Louis border. The tremor rumbled through several Illinois cities, shaking skyscrapers in Chicago and the state Capitol in Springfield.

"It was a fairly large earthquake in northeastern Illinois," said Sean Morrissey of the geophysics department at St. Louis University. "We don't have any magnitude yet. We felt it in our building here."

"I was sitting in my office watching the file cabinets move," said Cmdr. Richard Walton of the Springfield Police Department, who said there had been no reports of damage or injuries in the state capital.

E. Erie Jones, executive director of the Central United States Earthquake Consortium based in Marion, estimated the tremor was in "excess of 3" on the Richter scale, a magnitude that can cause slight damage.

Workers in Detroit buildings and Tiger Stadium also felt the tremor, and a guest on the eighth floor of the 25-story Hotel Ponchartrain downtown felt it, said night manager Ophelia Twine. The tremor also was felt in Grand Rapids, Milwaukee and Chicago.

Tuition

State University, Fort Hays State University, Kansas University, K-State, Pittsburg State University and The Wichita State University.

Citing a study by the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Universities, he said a "slight majority" of institutions have established their fee-cost ratios at 25 percent. Citing the same study, he said about one-third of state and land grant universities have established their fee-cost ratios at 33 percent.

Legislative director of the Associated Students of Kansas, Mark Tallman said of the Regents decision, "We will not oppose this increase if the Board (of Regents) and the Legislature will increase the amount of student financial aid."

He said ASK has presented to the Regents a proposal for a four percent increase in student salary funding and an increase of $100,000 in work study funding.

The tuition increases were proposed by the Special Committee on Tuition, a committee composed of two Regents, two university presidents and two student body presidents. In March, the Committee had proposed a 12 percent increase in tuition costs for non-resident undergraduates and no increase for resident undergraduates.

Student Body President Kent Bradley, who was a member of the Committee, favors the three percent and nine percent increases over the original proposal because he thinks the original proposal might have discouraged non-resident students from attending K-State.

"I think it's a better alternative," he said. "I think you're really missing something if you don't see the benefits of out-of-state students."

Bradley said these benefits include non-residents' contributions to the economic development of the area, and the different perspectives non-resident students bring to the University.

Bradley also thinks the three and nine percent increases will raise more money to maintain the 25 percent fee-cost ratio than the original proposal.

The salary increases, which will take effect in the latter half of the 1987-88 school year, provide for a three percent increase for administrators, a two percent increase for state civil service employees and a two percent increase for student employees, Burris said.

"The reason that that figure (the total cost of education at Regents schools) keeps going up would be salary increases and other operating costs," Burris also cited inflation.

"It's going to have to go up sometime. Somewhere we're going to have to make a big jump (to maintain the current fee-cost ratio)," Bradley said.

Choir

be an educational experience.

"Going to Switzerland, and Germany and Austria two years ago, means you get to actually experience what you've learned in history class," Kahler said. "You see pictures of places and buildings, and we got to actually see some of them. Seeing it and experiencing it helps you understand it. The Alps are gorgeous!"

Walker said people should know that the choir is internationally known and respected. He said the choir receives invitations to perform around the world.

"After the Saint Moritz concert, I was approached by two members of the audience who said they were glad to hear us perform because they'd heard about the Kansas State Choir," Walker said. "They told me we sounded even better than they had heard."

Walker said the trip dispelled some of the traditional myths regarding rude American tourists.

"The University can, and should, be very proud of these students," Walker said.

sucking, acne-faced kingpin whose only role is dropping off foo-foo stationery.

In the scene where Axel confronts the killers and makes a crack about Nielsen's legs, she squeezes the trigger and tells him, "I suppose you're trying to be charming." This, we're led to believe, is a sample of things to come. Instead, all you get is a lot of suckling up; she to the boss and he to the audience.

Like his last project, "The Golden Child," Murphy could have done more with less. No comic-actor of his caliber need rely on the carnage, sloppy scenes and overloaded cast that this film does.

"Cop I" with its manic pace, clever characters and thumping soundtrack, was a certified gem. Trying to rival it must have been a huge task, but slapping something together like this, then making it top heavy with too many cars, cops and criminals is not the way to do it.

Foley and Co. are simply too good to end up in sequel land. The producers better take note of other crappy-cop-comedies ("Sledgehammer" for starters) and, hopefully, dish up something more original than another rehash like this one.

Cheap, but Effective

Iran may retaliate against U.S. force

By The Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iran intensified its verbal attacks against the United States Wednesday by threatening to turn the Persian Gulf into a "graveyard" if America intervenes in the region.

"In the event of an aggressive intervention in the Persian Gulf by American forces, the region will be turned into a graveyard for aggressors and their allies," said state-run Tehran radio, monitored in Nicosia.

On Tuesday, the radio issued a thinly veiled threat to attack U.S. nuclear reactors if American forces were to strike Iranian missile batteries in the Persian Gulf.

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger told Congress Wednesday that the Navy didn't expect Iran to attack American ships in the gulf.

"In the past, Iran has assiduously avoided even the mere hint of a threat toward U.S. ships, either combatant or commercial," he told the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

"We do not expect that situation to change, Iran's violent rhetoric notwithstanding. We believe they will not launch any attacks on American ships," he said.

In Tuesday's broadcast, Tehran radio said the United States' warning that it might attack Chinese-made HY2 Silkorm anti-ship missiles deployed on the strategic Strait of Hormuz, gateway to the gulf, was premature.

Washington considers Iran's deployment of the missiles a serious threat to freedom of navigation in the strategic waterway.

"Contrary to what they claim, (they) are unable to accept the risk of attacking Iranian missile bases in the Persian Gulf or other forms of confrontation," Tehran radio said.

"U.S. centers and nuclear reactors can be more vulnerable than the missile bases of the Islamic Republic of Iran," the radio said.

The radio apparently was referring to nuclear reactors in the United States, most of which are used to generate electricity, although a few government-run facilities also provide fuel for nuclear bombs.

The radio did not specify any targets or their locations and did not elaborate on its threat to attack.

Outside the United States, American-owned reactors are found only on board nuclear-powered submarines and surface warships of the U.S. Navy.

The Iranians have made several threats in recent weeks to show their willingness to fight the Americans if they attacked Iranian forces.

Court directs North to talk

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal judge Monday ordered Lt. Col. Oliver North to testify, under a limited grant of immunity from prosecution, before the congressional committees investigating the Iran-Contra affair.

U.S. District Judge Louis Oberdorfer, the court's acting chief judge, signed the order granting North limited or "use" immunity from prosecution.

The order, sought by the House and Senate committees, directs North to give testimony which he had refused to provide another congressional panel late last year.

The public Iran-Contra hearings are in recess this week, but panel lawyers are to take depositions in private from North and his one-time boss, former National Security Adviser John Poindexter, in preparation for their public testimony next month.

The public hearings resume a week from Tuesday.

The committees also obtained an order granting limited immunity Monday for Glenn Robinette, a former CIA official who installed a security system at North's home in Great Falls, Va.

Congressional sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the panels are trying to determine if Robinette was paid for the work from a secret Swiss bank account controlled by retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Richard Secord.

Secord has denied any such connection.

On June 4, the House panel voted 12-3 and the Senate panel voted unanimously to give North limited, or use, immunity, which would prohibit prosecutors from using any resulting congressional testimony by the former National Security Council aide as evidence against him.

Independent Counsel Lawrence E. Walsh had asked the committees not to vote to grant immunity to North.

Federation protests against Holiday Inn

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Carrying signs bearing the slogans, "Stamp Out Smut," "Porn Hurts" and "Family Hotel???", more than 20 members of the Manhattan Chapter of the National Federation for Decency picketed at the Holiday Inn, 530 Richards Drive, late Monday afternoon.

The organization marched on the sidewalk bordering the Holiday Inn's parking lot as part of a nationwide picketing effort to protest the showing of what they consider to be pornographic in-room movies at the hotel.

The NFD has promoted a boycott of Holiday Inns because it said the establishment is the largest distributor of in-room pornographic movies. More than 40 Holiday Inns were picketed in April, and the organization said they expect about 100 Holiday Inns to be picketed at this time.

Donald E. Wildmon, executive director of the NFD, said Holiday Inn offers soft-core porn movies in all their corporately owned motels and many of the locally owned units.

"We feel the public should know about the porn movies prior to checking into a Holiday Inn," Wildmon said.

Fritz Pyle, general manager of the hotel, said the Holiday Inn is not showing any movies that haven't been available in movie theaters or in video rental centers.

"They are just targeting us (Holiday Inns) to get media attention," he said.

Pyle said it was difficult for children to gain access to R-rated movies shown at the hotel and the accessibility is monitored carefully.

"All R-rated movies are shown after 10 p.m. It costs $6.50 to obtain access to the movie, and they have to be called into the front desk, then a clerk has to program the movie in."

"We have done everything in our power to keep these movies from being accessible to everyone," Pyle said.

Local beer tavern soon to shut down

By JOLA MURPHY
Summer Life/City Editor

On July 1, one of Aggieville's most patronized pubs will close its doors. Brother's Tavern, a favorite hot spot for many K-State students, will shut down after more than 15 years of serving beer and providing entertainment.

Kevin Ladd and Max Strunk, owners of Brother's for two years, will lose their license to serve cereal malt beverages at the first of the month.

"We are closing down, but not by choice," Strunk said.

At a city commission meeting, Ladd and Strunk agreed to surrender their license on July 1 after a threat by the commission to revoke it immediately. The commission tabled the issue until after the first of the month.

Ladd and Strunk were fined $1,100 and placed on probation in October for overcrowding. In March, they received a second overcrowding fine of $5,000. Strunk said he and his partner refuse to pay the fine until it has come before a district jury trial Aug. 13.

"I don't think due process was dealt to us in municipal court," Strunk said.

Strunk said he and his partner requested a jury trial because they want to be tried by a jury, not a judge.

Previous to these fines, Ladd and Strunk were cited for three counts of overcrowding but were charged in only two of those instances on Aug. 21 and Sept. 19, 1986.

The number of people admitted into a public business is based on fire codes, which is determined by the square footage of the building. The maximum approved capacity for Brother's is 258 inside the bar and 88 for the beer garden.

"These men were in the position where there is no viable option," said Kent Glasscock, city commissioner. "Volunteering to give up their license is tantamount to us yanking it from them."

Glasscock said from a public service standpoint, there are laws all businesses have to stand by, and if these laws aren't followed, there will always be some type of consequence.

"The city lived up to its obligation," Glasscock said. "The end result was appropriate to the community."

Strunk said that he and Ladd have worked hard to establish their business in the past two years.

"Nothing comes easy," Strunk said. "We worked at it, and we had some good help."

Ladd and Strunk were both experienced in tavern management when they purchased Brother's. Strunk was the manager for Brother's for almost four years and Ladd managed Dark Horse Tavern. Strunk said they didn't sit back and watch it operate after they became owners.

"Our experience as managers helped us a lot," Strunk said. "We are very active in the day-to-day operation as owners."

Strunk said he and Ladd plan to sell the bar as soon as possible and several people are looking to buy the business.

"I was a successful businessman until they closed my doors," Strunk said. "The competition didn't run me out of town."

Strunk said Brother's has never been convicted of selling cereal malt beverages to a minor.

Regents begin new program

By CHRIS DOLL
Campus Editor

The six regent schools' budgets will reflect a new concern for "fiscal responsibility" if the Board of Regents' strategic planning program works as planned, said Stanley Koplick, regents executive director.

The program incorporates K-State's five-year plans for academics and facilities into a three-year budget proposal. The budget will specifically detail for what the money is used and why it was allocated for those items.

The Collegian will run a series beginning Thursday on each of the eight college's five-year plans and the budget proposals for the next three years, how the deans feel about the amount of money allocated to their colleges, what they plan to do with the money and the colleges' goals.

Another goal of the three-year budget is called margin of excellence, which raises faculty salaries to the average salary in peer institutions. For K-State, this means boosting salaries by about 8 percent. Currently, faculty salaries are about 92 percent of the average salary.

Strategic planning meant changing the process the administration used to develop budgets, said Donald Hoyt, assistant provost for planning and evaluation services.

But the changes have helped the administration develop a more effective budget.

"It's a longer, more complex process, but the final product is better because we know how much money we need and why," Hoyt said.

Before the budget process began this year, the administration developed a University master plan. It asked each college to make a charge statement consistent with the new University standards. A charge statement includes the college's purposes and what it emphasizes are.

Next, each college drew up plans for the next three years. Using these and the University master plan, the Deans' Council and the Strategic Planning Committee formulated the University's budget.

The administration completed the budget for fiscal 1988-89, and the plan includes perspectives for budgets for fiscal 1989-90 and 1990-91. The University will make the detailed request at the regents' monthly meeting June 25.

Before strategic planning, the budget was based on politics and how well each university could coax the Board of Regents and the Priest to organize Kansas opposition to aid for Contras

By SCOTT MILLER
Staff Writer

In the months ahead, Kansans will be hearing a new voice concerning aid to the Contra rebels.

Jack Moynihan, a Catholic priest, will be traveling around Kansas to organize grassroots opposition to the Contra-aid vote scheduled in Congress for this fall. If passed, the aid would support a rebel group trying the overthrow the Sandanista government in Nicaragua.

Moynihan, 52, who has spent the past 20 years working as a Maryknoll priest in Bolivia and throughout Latin America, returned to the United States in July 1986.

After meeting people who oppose U.S. policy in Central America, Moynihan decided to stay in the United States to organize opposition to Contra aid.

Moynihan said he came to Kansas because people had told him it was a leading state organizing against Contra aid. Next week, he plans to travel to western Kansas to begin making contacts with groups opposed to U.S. policy in Central America.

Kansas is a key state for the Congressional vote, he said, because Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., has acknowledged the lack of support for Contra aid among Kansans. Although Kassebaum has supported Contra aid in the past, Moynihan said he hopes a network of vocal opposition can persuade her to vote against it this fall.

Moynihan said the Nicaraguan Revolution is a "key historical event for all Latin America."

"All Latin America is very conscious of the Nicaraguan situation. It's got an option that's never been had," he said.

Moynihan said the option is to carry out a successful revolution independent from both the United States and the Soviet Union.

"They need the both of them, but they don't want to be aligned to one or the other," he said. "Their whole economic (program) is to work with other countries in the Third World."

Moynihan said because of Nicaragua's effort to remain non-aligned, the United States fears "the whole Monroe Doctrine will fall apart." The United States has set out to destroy the Nicaraguan liberation process by invoking a communist threat, he said.

"I'm not denying the sincere fear that people have of this so-called communism," Moynihan said. "It's ingrained in us in the United States, and we've imposed that fear on other people."

"Some people are sincerely concerned that something, this communism, whatever it is, is going to overtake us. The only problem is, it's not even known what it is."

Nicaragua is not communist."

Moynihan said Nicaragua is a pluralistic country with a constitution.

"As a matter of fact, the Marxist-Leninist political party would not sign the constitution precisely because it mentions God in the introduction, and also, it talks about pluralistic society," he said.

Although most of his work has been in Bolivia, Moynihan has also spent time in Peru, Brazil, Guatemala, Chile and Nicaragua, which he visited last January. Because of his work throughout Latin America and his contacts with others who have done similar work, he said he thinks he can make accurate comparisons between Nicaragua and other Latin American countries.

After joining the U.S. Navy, taking two years of technical school and working at various jobs, Moynihan became interested in Latin America. He joined the Maryknolls, the Catholic foreign mission society of the United States, because of its work in Latin America.

"I just decided I wanted to work with people. I really didn't define it myself — I couldn't define it," Moynihan said.

Communist party comes in second

ROME — Voters dealt a major blow to the Communists in Italy's parliamentary election while the long dominant Christian Democrats scored gains, first results and projections indicated Monday.

Projections issued by the Doxa polling agency and broadcast over state-run RAI television had the Christian Democrats holding their No. 1 position in the Chamber of Deputies with 34.1 percent, up from 32.9 percent in the last parliamentary election in 1983. In the Senate, the Christian Democrats were projected to win 33.3 percent, up from 32.4 percent in 1983.

The Communists, Italy's second largest party and the biggest Marxist party in the West, were projected to win 26.4 percent in the Chamber of Deputies, down from 29.9 percent, and 28.3 percent from 30.8 percent in the Senate.

Communist and other politicians said the party lost votes to the Greens, who were projected to get 2.7 percent in the chamber and 2.1 percent in the Senate in their first parliamentary bid.

The projections indicated the Socialists getting 14.5 percent, up from 11.4 percent in the lower house and increasing by a lesser margin in the Senate.

Elizabeth follows knightly tradition

WINDSOR, England — Following a 639-year-old tradition, Queen Elizabeth II on Monday buckled a garter below the knee of former Prime Minister Sir James Callaghan in a ceremony in the throne room at Windsor Castle.

Callaghan put up his white-stockinged left leg on a footstool to receive the Order of the Garter, an honor that is the personal gift of the monarch.

Callaghan, 75, is the Labor Party leader ousted in 1979 by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and her Conservative Party.

The order was founded in 1348 by King Edward III, when he picked up a garter dropped by the countess of Salisbury at a court festival and gallantly tied it round his own knee, saying, "Shame on him who thinks evil of it."

The reference was to gossips who cast aspersions on the lady who lost her garter.

Shultz favors aid for war memorial

CORREGIDOR, Philippines — Secretary of State George P. Shultz, a veteran of Pacific campaigns in World War II, pledged his support Monday for U.S.-Philippine plans to recapture this historic island's battle monuments from vandals and jungle rot.

Corregidor, a 3-mile-long scar of vegetation and rock at the mouth of Manila Bay, loomed large in America's consciousness in the winter of 1942 when its garrison — huddling in a concrete complex called the Malinta tunnel — held out against advancing Japanese armies.

James Black Jr., a Corregidor-born businessman and historian, said a down payment of $250,000 and annual donations of $100,000 are needed to repair and maintain the museum and memorial — a circle of stone pillars surrounded by walkways leading to a stylized sculpture representing an eternal flame. Black also wants the American Battle Monuments Commission to add Corregidor to memorials it maintains.

The Philippine Ministry of Tourism has a more ambitious idea. It has proposed turning the entire island into a theme park and resort that would cater to international tourists. The projected cost: $75 million to $100 million.

Pentagon to offer Canada weapons

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon said Monday it had approved new sales of Navy torpedoes and air-to-air fighter missiles to Canada.

Assuming there are no congressional objections, the Pentagon said Canada would be offered 24 MK-48 torpedoes for $31 million and 96 Sparrow missiles for $23 million. In both cases, the Navy will be responsible for overseeing the transaction.

The prime contractor for the torpedoes will be Gould Inc., while Raytheon Co. and General Dynamics Corp. will provide the Sparrow missiles.

Former Hart aide considers running

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Rep. Patricia Schroeder said Tuesday she should know by the end of the summer whether she will have the financial backing to run for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination.

"No dough, no go," Schroeder, of Colorado, said while meeting activists at state Democratic headquarters.

"This will be the first pay-as-you-go campaign," she said. "I see no way you can deplore the (federal) deficit and run one yourself."

She said consultants will help her decide by the end of the summer whether she has enough support to warrant a White House bid.

Schroeder, who coined the phrase "Teflon president" to describe President Reagan, is the only woman who has talked about running in 1988.

"I do think America is man enough to back a woman," she said.

She began considering a run after Gary Hart pulled out of the race. Schroeder was national co-chair of the former Colorado senator's 1984 presidential bid and his short-lived 1988 effort.

Wichita boy dies under trash truck

WICHITA — One boy was killed and his brother suffered leg injuries Monday when the two were struck by a garbage truck while riding double on a bicycle.

Police identified the dead youth as Michael V. Sublett, 4. His brother, Shane U. Sublett, 7, was treated for leg injuries and released.

CAREER PLANNING AND PLACEMENT reminds those who will be completing requirements for their degrees in the summer to report employment or other plans if firm, or solicit help in Holtz Hall if seeking employment.

Wichita police Capt. Charles Rummery said Michael was riding on the bar between the handlebars and seat on his brother's bicycle near the boys' south Wichita home. The two rode beside the truck without realizing it was about to turn into an alley, Rummery said.

Ex-policeman free from prosecution

WICHITA — A 78-year-old retired police detective who wounded an apparent robber Sunday will not be prosecuted, authorities decided Monday.

"He was using reasonable force in defense of himself and another, his wife, and their property," said Greg Waller, a Sedgewick County assistant district attorney.

In 27 years on the Wichita Police Department, Al Pinaire never fired his gun at a suspect.

He came home from a short walk early Sunday morning to find an intruder demanding money while holding a four-inch knife to his wife's throat. He pulled a .38-caliber automatic from a shoulder holster and pointed it at the man.

During the standoff, Pinaire offered to let the man leave unharmed. Instead, the would-be robber pulled Pinaire's wife to the front door. When she fell and got out of the line of fire, the retired policeman shot the suspect in the left leg from a distance of 20 feet. The man hobbled off, but was arrested a short time later about a block away.

"I didn't want to kill him. I shoot bullseyes. I don't shoot people. I keep my hand in, but I shoot at paper," Pinaire said.

KU enrollment down due to reduced courses

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Summer session enrollment at the University of Kansas decreased 9.4 percent this year, something officials said they expected because of a 25 percent reduction in summer course offerings.

The KU office of educational services reported Monday that 7,972 students, 825 fewer than last year, were enrolled on Wednesday, the first day of summer classes. On the first day last year, 8,797 students were enrolled.

KU Chancellor Gene A. Budig said cuts in summer course offerings were necessary because of cuts in the current budget made in January. The cuts, part of an attempt to reduce the state budget, amounted to $3.1 million on the Lawrence campus, he said.

At Kansas State and Wichita State universities, enrollments increased, officials said.

Grain Institute offers course

By JACQUELINE JORDAN
Collegian Reporter

Besides rain and a bit of sunshine, it takes knowledge to grow grain in not only Kansas but the rest of the world.

International students at K-State are taking a short course on grain and marketing so they can later apply newly acquired skills and techniques in their home countries.

The Food and Feed Grain Institute at K-State is offering a seven-week course on grain storage and marketing to 32 students from several Latin American, Asian and African countries.

Cornelius Hugo, assistant professor of agricultural economics and the course's coordinator, said the program's purpose "is to share with several developing countries knowledge and technology in order to help reduce grain loss and make their (grain science) system more effective and efficient."

In addition, Hugo said, the course is designed to train these students so that when they go home they can teach their own personnel how to grow and manage wheat, rice, corn, soybeans and other grains.

"In this way there is less foreign dependency and, in turn, (they) are able to magnify and extend this acquired knowledge across their own country," he said.

Students will be receiving three weeks of basic instruction in the areas of grain properties, storage methods and procedures, principles of drying and aeration, pest control, principles of management and

'It is difficult to measure the magnitude of this but that through our observations and correspondence (with these developing countries) we are able to see the positive impact of this course.'

operations, agricultural policy, warehouse management and inventory control and grain marketing systems and their development.

This course is mainly sponsored each summer by the Agency of International Development. Other agencies offering scholarships include the U.S. Agency for International Development, Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, World Bank and other international agencies involved in world agricultural development.

Eight teachers specializing in different topics instruct the class in English along with eight interpreters who translate into French and Spanish.

Following this basic construction, Hugo said that students will choose to specialize in either marketing or storage and will receive an additional three weeks of in-depth training in their chosen area.

The in-depth training in marketing covers management, facilitating market operations, transportation, storage costs and alternatives for price analysis, forecasting and economic and financial analysis.

The in-depth training in storage covers grain inspection, moisture measurement, stored-grain pests, grain drying and aeration, grain-handling equipment and integrated storage management.

A seven-day field trip to Texas, one of six states where rice is produced commercially in the United States, will give the students a first-hand look at how rice production, processing, promotion and exportation is handled.

The course costs $6,183 for FAO participants and $6,532 for other donor agencies who are programmed from Washington, D.C., to sponsor students. Fees include a pre-course orientation in Washington, D.C., manuals and training aids, instruction, field trip transportation, medical insurance, and room and board provided from the maintenance allowance.

Hugo said the entrance requirement is based on the student's work experience in this field of study.

"If they are professional economists, agronomists and chemists but have never entered the field in...postharvest grain systems, then they will most likely benefit from this class instruction," he said.

Currently, Hugo said, four students have returned to K-State this year to earn a graduate degree in grain science because they were so enthusiastic with class instruction that they felt "impelled" to come back to get a master's or doctoral degree.

Such is the case of Adelis Arrevillagas from Estado Barinas, Venezuela, who took the class in 1983 and came back two years later to work on his master's degree in grain science.

Arrevillagas said his country has suffered "a 30 to 40 percent grain loss" and this is one reason developing countries need to become better equipped and specialized.

"I asked the university (in Venezuela) to see if I could teach a course like this one in order to provide technical assistance. The university has consented to the idea and this is why I am here," he said.

Regarding how this course benefits developing countries, Hugo said that "it is difficult to measure the magnitude of this but that through our observations and correspondence (with these developing countries) we are able to see the positive impact of this course."

For the past 17 years, looking at it from a global perspective, one is able to see changes taking place worldwide in terms of available projects and donating agencies, Hugo said.

"For example, 10 years ago, a project involved in the postharvest grain system never existed," he said. "Today you have thousands of projects in this area. Of course we have not caused all these changes but do realize that during these 17 years (of instruction) we have been able to contribute in surging such ideas."

Dentists achieve quality program

By DEBRA COUTURE
Collegian Reporter

The Dental Associates of Manhattan have achieved a special degree of quality assurance.

The practice is the sole dental practice in Kansas, and one of 15 in the United States, to receive accreditation through the American Academy of Dental Group Practice.

Accreditation is important for dental practices because it provides a basis of quality assurance in the dental profession that is important, just as it is in any profession, said Dr. Charles Hughes of Dental Associates.

Pat Underwood, office manager for Dental Associates, said the process of accreditation is not easy.

"The AADGP guidelines are sent, then the office must implement the guidelines, write a protocol book, then submit records with the protocol book to the AADGP for approval," she said. "After they are approved, we are inspected by a team of dentists from accredited practices."

Hughes said the process of accreditation took three years.

"After two years we were provisionally accredited, but we became fully accredited as of May 21 this year," he said.

"I think that practices under group contract (insurance) arrangements will be required to become accredited in the future," Hughes said.

In fact, he said, it might lead to all practices becoming accredited in the future.

Hughes said he believed one of the reasons that prompted the AADGP to start an accreditation program was malpractice suits.

"I believe that accreditation may lead insurance companies to lower malpractice insurance rates for dentists. This will make other dental practices want to become accredited," Hughes said.

Underwood said they had to buy a new magna-clave machine to heat sterilize all the instruments used to meet AADGP standards.

"We even sterilize the disposable instruments before they are thrown away."

"We started magna-clave sterilization before AIDS was talked about. We were doing chemical or cold sterilization," Hughes said. "Obviously over a period of time, it may add to the cost slightly, but the benefits are quality dental care with no chance of infection."

Chemical sterilization doesn't kill spores which can lead to infection, but the magna-clave process does, he said.

'Simply doing my job' no believable defense

Before her testimony last week, Fawn Hall, who was Lt. Col. Oliver North's secretary, had remained much of an enigma. At one point last autumn, North said of her, "I have the prettiest secretary in Washington. Everyone thinks I'm fooling around with her, but I'm not." That's the kind of statement that tends to raise more questions than it answers.

Unfortunately, Hall's statements have also done little to dispel the sexist stereotype of a beautiful secretary with no brains. "It was a policy of mine not to ask questions and just to follow instructions."

"I believed in Colonel North and what he was doing. I had no right to question him." When asked about altering sensitive White House documents, she replied, "I felt a little bit of uneasiness when he asked me to do this," but she added she thought North must have some "good reason."

Hall's defense must ring very familiar to anyone who has followed the statements of Ed Meese, George Bush, Donald Regan, William Casey, George Shultz, Caspar Weinberger, Elliott Abrams and especially the president. The essence of statements by all of these officials has been: "I don't know."

Interestingly, Hall's defense also bears a striking resemblance to those of another group of officials — the Nazi war criminals. "I was only doing my job," Hall told the congressional committees — a defense that didn't work at Nuremberg and one that won't work now.

Hall also told the committees, "sometimes you have to go above the written law, I believe." Hall can thank her lucky stars that the congressional committees granted her complete immunity almost immediately after the Iran-Contra debacle. Otherwise, she might be forced to discover just how weak her defense really is.

Step this way to fortune, fame

Dear Joe,

I was parking my car last night after church when suddenly, I received a vision from the Lord. He said for us to get married and found the G.O.O.D. TV ministries (Give Oodles Of Dollars). Why you and me? The Lord told me you're photogenic and are very good at doing what you say you are against. And you make good speeches.

Forget about majoring in business: you'd make more money preaching while I cry (because G.O.O.D., not we, is in debt). Like Jim and Tammy Bakker, we'd make $129 million more than some businesses and we wouldn't have to pay a dime in taxes. But I refuse to wear all that make-up — I don't want my face looking like a mask.

Where would all that money come from? If our solicitation letters came the same day as social security checks, we'd get most of it from senior citizens. Who cares if we're taking it from the elderly? They won't need it much longer.

And we need the money to pay for cleaning the mansion in North Carolina, the mirrored arches in our condo in New York City, the gold plumbing in the condo in Florida, silver plates for my poodles in Palm Springs, and cosmetic surgery whenever I feel like you're neglecting me.

KIM ZOLLMAN
Collegian

However, we're going to have to use some of it for $1.6 million gifts for high church officials. And if there's any left we'll give it to charity (like your crippled nephew). After all, we have to set priorities.

The best part of it is, Joe, not only don't we have to change our extravagant lifestyles at all, but even though we're married, we don't have to make a commitment to each other.

You can continue to be a playboy. When you're 40, you could have an affair with a church secretary who's young enough to be your daughter and nobody will know about it until six years later. I don't care if you fool around or with whom you do it — just be sure to use protection — I don't want to get AIDS.

If can't we stand each other after a few years of marriage, we can come and go from the TV studios in separate cars in order not to see much of each other. The only physical contact we'd need to make is holding hands in front of the camera. For $129 million, I'd be willing to make that sacrifice.

And if the public finds out, who cares about the disillusionment and shattered faith? We'd still have the mansion in North Carolina, the mirrored arches in New York City, the gold plumbing in Florida, and my poodle's silver plates in Palm Springs.

Then, the vision left as mysteriously as it came. And I wrote you as soon as I could. Call me and we'll negotiate.

Your future G.O.O.D. co-founder, Kim

P.S. I neglected to tell you the Lord said he would strike you down if you don't marry me — or give $129 million — your choice.

School pride: not just a game

It's time for summer and school for the select breed of K-Stater who doesn't let his or her education wither from May to August. We like to pat ourselves on the back about our specialness. For here we are when others have left the university behind. We are the lifeblood of the university who stick it out through the summer and see all the sides of K-State — the fast and the slow. We stay when the ephemeral attractions of sports, pep and culture are not at their peak. Yes, the summer school student — a special person compared with the usual student herd.

During the fall and spring, one hears the raucous cries of school pride envisioned as the gladiatorial contests of football and basketball. But where are the people seeing things this way in the summer? They flit off to Johnson County, the farms and the coasts. They hold their parasitic tendencies in bay until fall semester when they return to the educational fold that has been kept alive, by us, the summer student. What would this place be without these educationally oriented summer students except for a breeding ground for tourists?

But this pride about being a summer student has the same deficiencies that fall and spring students exhibit in their pride. Both attitudes are elitist.

The elitism of the summer student is to believe that we have more sense and motivation than the rabble in the fall and spring since we take advantage of the increased educational focus of the University in the summer.

The elitism of the fall and spring student is to believe that one's department or school is the best. We are all familiar with this type of pride. When thinking about themselves, students split into departmental factions believing that the best student is an architecture or an engineering or a political science student. Everybody has his little nest to feather and pontificate about to those

NEAL CLIMENHAGA
Collegian
Columnist

Philistines in the other departments.

When thinking about our school, this pride manifests as believing our school is the best. Three cheers for our school. When we speak of other schools we put them down, especially that school and those students down the river in Lawrence. It features the University of Kansas student — an artsy societal reject who goes to a school that isn't as professional or real as ours. It doesn't have a nationally recognized architecture program or engineering department or veterinary school.

We believe KU is the school filled with Johnson Countians who don't want to get too far from the fold. They stay in the Lawrence-Kansas City megalopolis instead of being brave pioneers like us out here on the cutting edge of the Plains. As Patrick Muir so eloquently put it when discussing this — "We wanted to do our own thing, get away from Mom and Dad, go where few Johnson Countians had gone before."

Obviously, this attitude is based more on opinion and prejudice than fact. It begins to sound like a throwback to the days of Athens and the city-state — only in a bad way. We pit our contestants against their contestants. We talk of our independence and their dependence. We emphasize our good things and denigrate or ignore their good things.

As part of the package, we ignore the bad things in our little city-state-university. This mentality allows Farrell Library to deteriorate while the KU library is a gem. If we just gloss over the faults at our school they continue unchecked while we remain proud about K-State and spiteful toward other universities.

These elitisms of school pride miss the point of being in a university and can ultimately undercut the process of university education. A university should foster pluralism, not elitism. Webster defines a university as "an educational institution of the highest level, typically with one or more undergraduate schools or colleges, together with a program of graduate studies and a number of professional schools." The university is not just an agricultural college or a political science department but the combination of all departments and a cooperative agreement between them. We, as students, come to a university to learn from the intermingling of these programs and, in the process, develop our own individuality and interconnection with the world.

If this process is a success, it certainly is something to be proud of, but we should not let that pride short-circuit the process. If we engage in elitist pride, we end up boxed off into our separate little disciplines within the University and boxed off from other universities as well. Instead of focusing on the idea that those folk at KU are just a bunch of yahoos, we should acknowledge that they are just the same as us, the only difference being their location.

Hopefully, humanity can begin to outgrow the provincialism that pride and specifically school pride can be. We should learn to look a little farther than the home turf for our education; that is, see the world as the home of the University instead of the Little Apple. Maybe those students who leave Manhattan for the summer are on to a good thing after all.

Pornography hurts

Editor,

I am responding to the column written a few weeks ago supporting pornography. To think that pornography is a harmless form of entertainment is absurd. This statement hinges on ones definition of two words — "entertainment" and "harmless."

If calling pornography entertaining isn't completely absurd, then speaking of it as harmless certainly is. How can material that discriminates against an entire gender be called harmless? How can material that uses children as sexual objects be called harmless? How can material that degrades human dignity and rips at family life be called harmless?

Pornography dehumanizes women and lowers society's respect for them. It is a common denominator of practically all pedophile crimes. It acts as a drug to its users and demands more and more of itself. It reduces sex to nothing more than an act of gratification for self, emptying it of commitment, love and respect.

And yet, pornography protects itself by appealing to the First Amendment of our Constitution, a document designed to protect people's freedom, not exploit it. Other laws have been made for our protection, such as those against theft, murder and speeding. Granted, these laws take away some freedoms, but total freedom results in chaos. A society without limits has no direction to follow, but one of descent.

Articles are unfair

Editor,

A series of articles printed spring semester about the Middle East gave me the impression that Collegian journalists did not make a great effort to seek correct information. Time and again I would run into misrepresentation of facts. Time and again I would promise myself to respond. But I never did. Then came "U.S. oblivious to Mideast crisis," by Kirk Caraway (May 6) and I could no longer keep quiet.

The Collegian lately received the five-star award for college journalism, and I feel that, at least for its coverage of Middle East affairs, it does not deserve the award.

The Jews came to Palestine because they were not welcomed anywhere else. Indeed, they wanted a homeland in the land which was once their own. The land they found was impoverished; the land of milk and honey had turned into a desert as a result of hundreds of years of abuse by uncaring conquerors.

Palestine was mostly unpopulated and its inhabitants were mainly poor farmers who did not own the land they worked, and who paid annual taxes to rich feudals who lived in Syria and Lebanon. The feudals sold land to the Jews. First, they sold them useless land-swamps; then, they started selling the rest. It seems they did not care much about their fellow brothers and sisters.

Later, as more Jews arrived, the Palestinian national movement was born, and the two movements grew, side by side, under British rule. A Palestinian state never existed; therefore, the Jews could not, as Caraway claims, later prevent the display of the "former flag of the (Palestinian) country."

In 1987, the United Nations declared the establishment of two neighboring and independent states — Jewish and Palestinian. The Jews did not merely decide that "(the) government will now be controlled by them." The night Israel was constituted it was attacked by all its neighboring countries. Israel won the war and the Palestinian state was never established.

Many Palestinians fled the country during that year-long war. Some were forced and driven to leave — an act that cannot be justified — but most left because they were told by the Arabs that it would facilitate a victory over the Jews, and because they were afraid — they knew how they would treat the Jews if they were to win the war. The Palestinians who chose to stay in Israel are equal Israeli citizens with a right to vote and to be elected.

Israel was forced into war again in 1967, and conquered more land. Its leaders immediately announced that Israel would return these territories in return for peace. Twenty years have gone by and only one country, Egypt, offered a peace treaty. Egypt received its territories in return.

I was born in Israel and lived there all my life. For me, and for 5 million others, Israel is home. I would personally agree to give the West Bank to the Palestinians as an independent state. But would they agree that I stay in my own state? The Palestinian declaration calls for the departure of all Jews who came to Palestine after 1913, and this constitutes the majority of the Israeli population. So, until we reach an agreement, Israel rules over the West Bank. I am far from happy about the form this rule has taken, and surprising as this may sound to you, Israelis do try to change it, but still, writing that "(almost) every week, Israeli soldiers kill Palestinian students..." lacks substance and calls for greater care from you as journalists.

Fear and hate exist on both sides. Both peoples will have to overcome misconceptions. I expect the Collegian journalists to not fall into any of those misconceptions, but rather, to search for the truth.

Kirk Lynch, a member of Scartaglen, strums his guitar while playing to a small group that has gathered to listen to the group's Celtic music. Many musical groups performed at Oakdale Park during the festival.

Storyteller Jackie Torrence closes one eye to emphasize a point while telling a story at the Children's Stage during the Smokey Hill River Festival. Torrence, along with many others, performed acts of all kinds throughout the day.

Summertime tradition: Smoky Hill River Festival

A summer in Kansas wouldn't be complete without the tradition in Salina that has drawn thousands of people to Oakdale Park for more than a decade.

The Smoky Hill River Festival kicked off last weekend with more entertainment, food and exhibits than ever before.

The annual event is a celebration of arts and entertainment ranging from country and western music to classical children's storytelling.

Although the temperatures were in the 100s, the festival attracted more than 17,000 people on Friday, 30,000 on Saturday and 9,000 on Sunday.

Lana Jordan, coordinator of the festival for five years, said the entertainment will probably be what people will remember the most about the festival this year. Three stages contained continuous entertainment from 10 a.m. until 11 p.m. Jazz, classical, country, rock and nostalgia were featured.

"My husband and I come every year to listen to the jazz music," said Lois Barricklow of Ashland. "We appreciate good musicians, but we love jazz the most."

The banner headline group to hit the festival this year was Regency, a five-man a cappella group that blends several different types of music to make their own special style. The group drew a foot-tapping crowd Friday night.

"The festival has done very, very well," Jordan said.

"We had a high attendance this year in spite of the heat."

"People tend to take a break from the heat in the afternoon, but always seem to show up again in the evening for the lineup of entertainment."

The basic format and setup of the festival has not changed over the years, Jordan said, but new and different entertainers are invited to attend every year.

This year the festival gained national recognition by being named one of the top 100 events in North America by the American Bus Association and was cited in U.S. News & World Report as one of the many things to see and do in the Midwest.

"Getting national recognition helped us out this year," Jordan said.

Jordan said her job is a year-round position working for the Salina Arts and Humanities Commission, though she does have other minor duties.

The arts commission rounded up more than 800 volunteers to help with the festival and employed several stage crews and technical assistants.

More than 112 artists and craftsmen came from 14 states to display and sell their work. Their exhibits included pottery, wood, watercolor, leather, fiber, photography and jewelry.

Jo Ann Nees, a weaver from Wichita, has been displaying her crafts at the festival for six years.

"They always have marvelous crowds," Nees said. "I enjoy my weaving but I really enjoy the people who come to my booth to see it."

Nees said she spent up to 30 hours a week weaving to prepare for the festival.

Many of the exhibitors are simply hobbyists. Geoffrey Johnson of Denver expresses his talents in making Appalachian dulcimers, a stringed instrument similar to a ukulele.

Robert and Eddie Hiebert, of the Abilene-based group Hammered Dulcimers, play their dulcimers as part of a roving act. Appearing for the second time, the group performed on all three days of the event.

"It's my livelihood," Johnson said. "I work many hours on these instruments, and I put a lot of heart into it."

Throughout the festival, roving acts performed for passers-by. These acts included a traveling puppet show, Huck the Clown, jugglers, a glass-harmonica player and a special Dixieland band performing on a fire engine.

Arts and entertainment were not the only things the festival participants watched. Food booths lined the sidewalks with a wide variety of great eating, from pasta salads to funnel cakes and barbecued turkey drumsticks.

Each person attending purchased a lapel button for $5 at the gate and could attend all events the entire weekend.

Reagan cites need for significant cuts

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, denying that he came home empty-handed from the Venice summit, says a congressional "lapse of faith" is threatening progress that he and other world leaders made toward economic health.

"The truth is we came home from this summit with everything we had hoped to accomplish," the president said in an 18-minute nationally broadcast speech Monday night from the Oval Office.

"I was particularly gratified, for example, for the support our allies gave to our Persian Gulf policy; it was extended without hesitation," the president said, although the support was limited to diplomatic rather than military backing.

Reagan answered critics of his plan to protect oil tankers in the Persian Gulf with American warships by saying, "If we don't do the job, the Soviets will," and he said U.S. national security would be jeopardized if the Kremlin becomes the guardian of gulf oil.

Reagan disputed reports that "nothing was really accomplished at the summit, and the United States in particular came home empty-handed" while saying he "felt among the other six summit leaders a sense of unease about America's commitment to a consistent, enforceable plan to reduce our deficits."

He said he had "a special message, one that is about our own economy, about actions that could jeopardize the kind of progress we made toward economic health last week in Venice as well as the prosperity that during the last six years all of us here in America have worked so hard to achieve."

The president recalled the passage two years ago of the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction legislation which he supported, but added, "And what's happened to that restraint on wasteful domestic spending solemnly promised under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings? It vanished. And to pay for this lapse of faith you, the taxpayers, are going to be saddled with an approximately $100 billion bill over the next four years."

He renewed his plea for a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget and for congressional action to permit him to veto specific items in appropriation bills. He said he would spell out other budget reforms, which he called "an economic Bill of Rights."

Following the speech, Democratic leaders in Congress attacked his fiscal policies and said his Persian Gulf plans are deceptive.

Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., said the president's budget picture "was like his early explanation of the Iran-Contra misadventure. It was long on rhetoric, short on facts and left a misleading impression."

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Reagan "is a master at delivering these speeches and he gave his usual performance." Reagan's remarks on the gulf held "nothing new," Nunn said.

Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas said Reagan's emphasis on the federal budget "was right on target."

"We need all the tools the president talked about — a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, the line-item veto and budget process reform — but we've also got to make the tough choices. We've got to cut spending," Dole said.

On arms control, Reagan noted that NATO foreign ministers agreed, in a post-summit meeting at Reykjavik, Iceland, to support the United States in formally proposing to the Soviet Union "the global elimination of all U.S. and Soviet land-based shorter-range INF (or intermediate range) missiles."

Negotiations with the Soviets, he said, "could lead to an historic arms reduction treaty" calling for a 50 percent cut in the superpowers' strategic forces.

Sunset Zoo to face 'barren' outlook; lack of federal grant ends positions

By KIM ZOLLMAN
Staff Writer

Due to deficiencies in its funding proposal, the Sunset Zoo was rejected in May for a federal grant from the Institute of Museum Services to keep the positions of veterinary technician and horticulturist.

Deficiencies in the proposal included lack of accreditation, security, broad-based support and long-term planning. The zoo would like to fix these problems, but the actions it can take depend on community support, said Steven Matthews, zoo director.

In order to improve the zoo and fix the deficiencies, Matthews said Zoo Plan Associates of Wichita, the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department and Friends of Sunset Zoo are developing a 20-year master plan which incorporates community views and specifies yearly accomplishments and how to attain them.

To attain accreditation, the animal shelter will be moved from the zoo offices to the industrial park near McCall Pattern Co., he said.

To improve security, Matthews said, the zoo needs to hire a night keeper to prevent vandalism and animal killings as well as stay up with sick animals needing attention.

Because the zoo's grant was not renewed, losing the two positions has affected the whole zoo.

Matthews said without plants, "this place (the zoo) would be a barren wasteland."

The horticulturist was responsible for the inventory of plants, vegetation in exhibits and on "the grounds and mowing the grass."

Now, in order to keep the maintenance man performing his regular duties, the zoo needs to hire a seasonal worker to cut the grass, Matthews said.

The veterinary technician played a key role in animal health care. Matthews said she acted as the liaison between the zoo and the College of Veterinary Medicine by checking the animals and testing samples every day. Thus, the animals had consistent health care.

Now, losing her also means losing the necessary consistency in health care, he said, and the zoo must go back to checking animals only two or three times a week.

In order to make major improvements, the zoo needs a horticulturist, a veterinary technician and a night keeper — as well as community support, Matthews said.

Other changes Matthews said he would like to see are improvements in parking and access for the handicapped, a walk-through aviary, underwater viewing of otters, improvement of reptile exhibits, a nocturnal exhibit, an outdoor primate exhibit, grassland hoof stock and a nursery.

Because of the budget deficit, 1988 will see no major improvements, he said, but in 1989 the zoo might be able to progress.

Matthews said he wanted to move away from cages and give the community, "as many close ties with animals as they can get."

According to Matthews, if the zoo were to build an outdoor chimp run, or exhibit, it could cost between $45,000 and $60,000, but the zoo only has $35,000 budgeted for the project.

Improving the bear exhibits from wire and concrete to a more open space where they can "use their natural abilities" to dig, climb and swim would cost $500,000 for each of the two exhibits needed, Matthews said.

Many of the zoo's expenses go to what most outsiders take for granted, he said. As well as direct animal care, the zoo installed gas, water and sewer lines and has improved the sidewalks on the grounds and repaired the stone walls.

In addition, about $160,000 of the zoo's total budget of $258,000 is allocated to pay for the salaries.

If the zoo is to use materials of the highest quality and durability and give the best care to animals, it needs more funding than it currently has, Matthews said.

The zoo receives its revenue from tax dollars, federal grants for major improvements and donations from organizations such as Friends of Sunset Zoo and charitable community clubs.

For future fund raisers, Matthews said the zoo might set an admissions price to see how many people came to the zoo, as well as to collect revenue.

Ric Urban, animal keeper, said that in October, KSKT-FM will sponsor a Fun Run, with the proceeds going into the zoo's improvement fund to help pay for items such as the chimp run. The race will start and end at the zoo.

ELIGIBILITY FOR CARE AT LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER

1. Health fees are established upon the recommendation of the Student Senate with approval by the Board of Regents.
2. All students who are enrolled and attending classes during a regular semester or summer session who have paid health fees are eligible for care.
3. Those enrolled in Special Courses, for varying periods of time, who have made previous arrangements for health care coverage at Lafene are eligible for care. (Lists of these students must be furnished prior to being seen at Lafene.)
4. Only students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene; however, they must pay the spouse fee within 10 days of the time their own health fees are paid. (Children cannot be seen.)
5. Emergency care, prior to referral, will be given anyone who comes in.
6. Students enrolled in 6 hours or less, electing not to pay the health fee during the Fall or Spring semesters, who wish to be seen, will be charged $20 for each office visit. This charge continues until the full health fee has been exceeded, then that student will be afforded the same privileges as the regular fee paying student for the remainder of that semester.
7. Students who were enrolled in the Spring and pre-enrolled for the Fall semester but not attending summer school may pay $15 and be eligible for care during the summer. This fee may be paid within 30 days prior to summer registration and ends the day classes begin. A late fee of $20 will be accepted for the remainder of the summer.
8. Health fees are good until 12 o'clock the night the next semester begins.

NOTE: In addition to the above mentioned fees, there are minimal charges for certain supplies and services and the charges are subject to change without prior notice.

K-State's Kruger chosen to coach Big 8 select team in China games

K-State head basketball coach Lon Kruger has been chosen to coach a select basketball team of Big Eight Conference players who will compete this summer in the Beijing International Tournament in China.

By The Collegian Staff

K-State head basketball coach Lon Kruger has been chosen to coach a select basketball team of players from the Big Eight Conference which will compete this summer in the Beijing International Tournament in China, the conference announced Friday.

As of publication time, a roster of players was still in the process of being selected, and Kruger announced that he was pleased to have the honor of being selected as coach of the team.

"We are delighted to be making this trip," Kruger said. "I recall some wonderful experiences from international travel when I was a player. It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for the players. The educational value of a trip like this simply can't be duplicated," he said.

Tentative plans call for the team to assemble in Manhattan on Aug. 10, to practice for five days, then to depart to Beijing for the tournament which will be Aug. 20-30.

The trip was arranged through the Amateur Basketball Association of the United States of America.

"We're pleased that a top conference like the Big Eight is able to participate," said Bill Wall, ABAUSA executive director. "Competition such as this fosters better international relations, and exposure to international competition will be very good for the participating players."

A roster of the team will be released at a later date.

Kruger's coaching honor is nothing new. In 1983, Kruger, along with former Wildcat coach Jack Hartman, was selected as an assistant coach for the USA Team playing in the Pan American Games in Caracas, Venezuela. That team ended up winning the gold medal.

Lakers' attack shifts burden from Jabbar to Magic; key to NBA championship title

By The Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — The Los Angeles Lakers won the NBA championship series the same way they dominated the regular season — by making Magic Johnson the vital cog.

After the Lakers lost to Houston in the 1986 Western Conference finals, Coach Pat Riley decided he was relying too much on Kareem Abdul-Jabbar when a game was on the line. Riley made the decision to feature a more balanced scoring attack, and the Lakers went on to finish 65-17 during the regular season, with Johnson the leading scorer for the first time in his eight-year pro career.

Sunday, although Abdul-Jabbar scored 32 points and James Worthy 22, it was Johnson who was the catalyst as the Lakers outscored the Boston Celtics 30-12 in the third quarter. Los Angeles went on to win Game 6 of the NBA finals 106-93, giving the Lakers a 4-2 victory in the series and their fourth title since 1980.

Abdul-Jabbar scored 19 points in the first half when Boston took a 56-51 lead. When the 40-year-old center picked up his fourth foul less than a minute into the third quarter, Johnson took over.

He had six points and three assists during the 18-2 spurt that started the period and gave Los Angeles the lead for good. Johnson finished with 12 points in the quarter, which ended with the Lakers ahead 81-68.

"Give a lot of credit for our success to Magic," said Abdul-Jabbar. "He accepted his role this year as team leader and played with enough intensity to inspire the other four guys on the floor."

Johnson, who averaged 26.2 points, 13 assists and eight rebounds in the championship series, said he knew he and Worthy would have to shoulder the burden after Abdul-Jabbar left the game in the third quarter.

"Kareem went out with four fouls and that left me and James in terms of scoring, so I looked for my shot and the first one went in, then two and that was it."

Abdul-Jabbar had 13 points in the fourth quarter, five during a 7-0 spurt after the Celtics scored six straight points to get as close as 92-80 with 5:27 left. Dennis Johnson, who led all scorers with 33 points, 13 in the fourth quarter, tried vainly to rally the Celtics.

Larry Bird, who was held to 16 points in the final game but still averaged 24.5 points and 10 rebounds in the series, said the early season acquisition of Mychal Thompson was crucial for the Lakers.

'Give a lot of credit for our success to Magic. He accepted his role this year as team leader and played with enough intensity to inspire the other four guys on the floor.'

— Kareem Abdul-Jabbar

The Celtics got only 29 points from their reserves in the last four games of the series. In the same span, the Lakers got 59 points from Thompson, including 15 in the finale.

Bird suggested that Celtics President Red Auerbach make some changes to strengthen the team's bench next season.

"It might be hard with the salary cap, but we know what we need," Bird said. "I'm sure Red is going to try to get us a couple more players."

Boston Coach K.C. Jones agreed with Bird that injuries to reserves Bill Walton and Scott Wedman seriously hurt the Celtics' chances.

"The heart of our bench was torn out," Jones said. "We did an amazing job just getting to the sixth game."

'Cats' recruits rank high on scout's list

By BILL LANG
Staff Writer

For Lon Kruger, men's basketball coach, the off-season has been just as successful as the regular season.

In a report published Sunday by the Manhattan Mercury, Rick Ball of Professional Associates, a scouting service for the college ranks, rated the recruiting class for this year for the K-State men's team as one of the top 10 in the nation.

Fred McCoy, a native of the Washington, D.C., area, who attended Allen County Community College, was the last signee for the 'Cats and that, according to Ball, was the difference of a good recruiting season and a great recruiting season.

"Without Fred McCoy, Kansas State wouldn't have been in the top 10 recruiting wise," Ball told the Mercury.

That top 10 landing might not have been possible had it not been for Virginia Tech being under investigation by the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

McCoy first signed with K-State, but his mother would not agree to sign the letter of intent. His mother later signed his letter of intent to play for Virginia Tech. However, it was found later that Tech was under investigation, so McCoy and his mother signed with K-State.

In the Mercury report Ball said that McCoy was a "Wes Unseld-type player."

"He's only 6-6½, but he's 235 (pounds)... He won't go outside like Norris (Coleman) did but he's got soft hands and will score if he gets the ball inside."

Two others who have signed with K-State and got favorable comments from Ball were a couple of guards from Indiana via the Kansas junior college ranks: Buster Glover, a teammate of McCoy's, a 6-footer from Lew Wallace High School in Gary, Ind., via Allen County Community College, and Carlos Diggins, a 6-4 guard from Clay High School in South Bend, Ind., via Butler County Community College.

Other signees include Wylie Howard, a 6-8, 210 pound forward from Boyd Anderson High School in Lauderdale Lakes, Fla.; Todd Stanfield, a 6-1, 165-pound guard from Hillcrest High in Springfield, Mo.; and John Rettiger, a 6-9, 210-pound center from Chase County High School in Cottonwood Falls.

Spinks hammers Cooney in decision

By The Associated Press

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Michael Spinks knocked down Gerry Cooney twice in the fifth round Monday night on his way to winning the scheduled 15-round heavyweight bout.

Spinks hurt Cooney with a right hand after Cooney missed with a wild left hook. Then Spinks landed a barrage of punches to the head that put Cooney down.

He got up at three but Spinks came to the attack and flattened him with another barrage.

The 6-foot-6 Cooney struggled to his feet again. But Spinks came on again, backing off briefly as if he needed a rest. A moment later, Spinks launched another barrage and finally referee Frank Cappuccino stopped the fight at 2:51.

The bout was billed by promoter

Butch Lewis as one for the heavyweight championship of the world, although the World Boxing Council and World Boxing Association recognize Mike Tyson as champion and the International Boxing Federation, which stripped Spinks, recognizes Tony Tucker.

The fight surely moves Spinks toward a major money-match with Tyson sometime in 1988.

The devastating loss most likely ended Cooney's career. It was his second defeat in an important bout. On June 11, 1982, he was stopped in the 13th round by Larry Holmes in a bid for the WBC title.

Tyson was in the audience and he had to be impressed with the 30-year-old Spinks' performance. No longer can anyone say that the former undisputed light heavyweight champion cannot hit like a heavyweight.

Royal fights disorder to return to KC

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jim Eisenreich, driven from the big leagues to semi-pro baseball because of a troubling nervous disorder, is on the verge of making it back.

The Kansas City Royals, who signed him after claiming him on waivers for $1, could call him up soon from their Double A farm club at Memphis. Eisenreich entered the weekend leading the Southern League with a .383 batting average, plus 34 doubles and 52 runs batted in.

"He's making a mockery out of the league," said Memphis Manager Bob Schaefer. "He's been incredible.

It's just a question now, not if he can get a hit in a game, but how many. I know he's mastered this league. There's nothing left for him to accomplish down here."

"He's just a man playing with boys," said Art Stewart, director of scouting for the Royals.

After the first half of the Southern League season ends Wednesday, the Royals are expected to do something about Eisenreich — very probably bringing him to Kansas City.

"I'm not in a big hurry or rush to make a move with Eisenreich, but it's logical to project that he'll be moved somewhere in the near future in our organization," said General Manager John Schuerholz. "I will tell you this: He will not stay in Memphis."

Eisenreich formerly was with the Minnesota Twins organization, but the nervous disorder that caused uncontrolled twitching forced him to give up on the major leagues in 1984.

He went back home to St. Cloud, Minn., working odd jobs and playing for the local semi-pro team the last three seasons. Meanwhile, he says he discovered that his problems were caused by a disorder known as Tourette's syndrome and that it could be controlled by medication.

Bob Hegman, a former college roommate of Eisenreich and now administrative assistant of player development for the Royals, told Schuerholz about the developments, and the team decided to take a chance on him.

"What we thought we'd do is sign him, bring him to spring training and just see how he looked," said Schuerholz. "To be honest, we wanted to see how he reacted to the baseball, to see if his medication had any ill effects."

"Everybody watched him with great scrutiny in batting practice, and we saw how well he reacted," he said. "And everybody saw how he hit."

Bosworth won't play; Seahawks won't trade

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — All-American linebacker Brian Bosworth of Oklahoma was picked by the Seahawks in the NFL supplemental draft Friday but said he would rather sit out the season than play for Seattle.

"We have him and we're going to make every effort to sign him," head Coach Chuck Knox said. "There's going to be a lot of posturing and rhetoric in the days coming up."

The Seahawks won the No. 1 pick in a lottery and picked Bosworth even though he had not listed them among the teams for which he would play. He reaffirmed his warning Friday at a news conference in New York.

"Seattle doesn't fit the mold I want to put myself in," Bosworth said.

"He has the leverage of playing or not playing," Seattle President and General Manager Mike McCormack said. "He's the same as any other player. I think his ability is what gives him the leverage."

Both Knox and McCormack said they would try to sign Bosworth rather than trade his rights to one of the teams on the list he said would play for.

"We're not even going to speculate on the possibility of a trade," said McCormack. "We've got players on our football team, some of whom are starting, whose agents sent out similar letters." He referred to a letter that Bosworth's agent, Gary Wichard, had mailed before the supplemental draft.

"We're not bluffing, we'll sit out the year if he doesn't get one of the teams he wants," Wichard said at the news conference. Wichard said he told that to McCormack when he talked to him after the supplemental draft.

Bosworth on Friday revised his list of preferred teams to four — Tampa Bay, Philadelphia, the New York Jets and the Los Angeles Raiders. Bosworth said Tampa Bay was "number one" on his list because he wanted to play with quarterback Vinny Testaverde, No. 1 pick in the April 28 NFL draft, and liked new head Coach Ray Perkins and owner Hugh Culverhouse.

"I hope something can be worked out by one of my preferred teams," Bosworth said.

Originally, Bosworth also had included the Los Angeles Rams and the New York Giants, but Wichard said Friday the Rams were out of the Bosworth picture because they don't have a first round pick and the Giants were eliminated because "they wanted to use him as only as a backup or on special teams."

Knox and McCormack said the Seahawks had a lot of leverage, too.

"If he wants to play this year, he has to play with us," said McCormack. "If he goes back in the draft next year, he doesn't know who is going to draft him. Maybe it would be Buffalo. And if he sits out this year, I think his skills would really be diminished."

"If he doesn't play this year, he loses one year of earning power," Knox said of Bosworth. "He also has no assurances that he won't be picked by one of the teams he doesn't want to play for."

Seattle won the first choice when the team's logo was picked from a drum containing the logos of all 28 NFL teams. The draft, for players not eligible for the regular draft, was weighted so that the teams with the poorer records had the most chances of getting the top pick.

None of the other five players eligible for the draft was chosen.

After Seattle, the order of selection was Indianapolis, Kansas City, Atlanta, Chicago, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, New Orleans, San Diego, St. Louis, Green Bay, Minnesota, Dallas, Detroit, Jets, Rams, Tampa Bay, Miami, Denver, Cincinnati, Washington, Houston, Raiders, San Francisco, New England and Giants.

Bosworth ignores 'hawks; Who needs whom more?

At a news conference last Friday in New York, controversial All-American linebacker Brian Bosworth of the University of Oklahoma said he would rather sit out the next professional football season than play for the Seattle Seahawks.

This statement was made in reaction to Seattle picking Bosworth after winning the first choice in the NFL's supplemental draft lottery, in which teams with poorer records had more chances of getting the top pick.

The question of the day is: Why is this even an issue?

Since he first colored his hair orange or blond or red or whatever, and because he was accused of taking steroids and banned from last year's Orange Bowl, "the Boz" has been in the nation's collegiate football spotlight.

Controversy and sensationalism have seemed to follow Bosworth lately and he truly has basked in the publicity.

With this decision to "pick and choose" his future NFL team with assistance from his agent, Bosworth has managed to pull the media spotlight his way once again.

It makes one wonder if he's doing it for the cause or the commer-

JEFF RAPP
Sports Columnist

cialism.

First, realizing Bosworth's agent sent out warning letters to the teams that the former Oklahoma star "would definitely not" play for, the move may seem like a brave one.

Bosworth, then, had the attitude that there were only certain teams in pro football he would like to play for.

Unfortunately, Bosworth hasn't gotten it through his thick, shaven head that the professional football draft is used for a reason, which is to give lesser teams a shot at better newcomers, as to create parity within the league.

No, Mr. Bosworth, not even you can change the rules. They were conceived long before the NCAA's set of rules exercised its power over you by excluding you from the 1987 Orange Bowl for use of steroids.

Among the teams Bosworth originally hand-picked to play on were the New York Giants, the New York Jets, the Philadelphia Eagles, the Los Angeles Rams and the Los Angeles Raiders.

Later he decided the Tampa Bay Buccaneers would be a good squad to play for because Heisman Trophy-winning quarterback Vinny Testaverde would be playing for them.

Approaching the draft, however, Bosworth nixed the Giants, because he would have to ease into a starting position for the world champions. He also decided the Rams weren't a desirable bunch because they didn't have a first-round draft pick.

I agree with the attitude of Seahawks President and General Manager Mike McCormack.

"If he wants to play this year, he has to play with us," McCormack said. "If he goes back into the draft next year, he doesn't know who is going to draft him. And if he sits out this year, I think his skills would really be diminished," he said.

Bingo.

Boz, I hate to tell you this, but you need the NFL a heck of a lot more than it needs you.

tion program with the Maryknolls. Moynihan spent two years in Harlem before being assigned to Bolivia in 1967. He said his time in Harlem was a major turning point in his life because he began to see things from other people's point of view.

"That really gave me the opportunity to see the other side of life," Moynihan said. "I thought I was real liberal. In the Navy I had black friends, and in high school. And then I came to the really shocking realization that I had prejudices."

"But I didn't realize until I went back home again, that my own family, whom I thought was also liberal, and saw their prejudices. I said, 'Why didn't I ever notice it before?'"

As part of his work in Bolivia, Moynihan helped campesinos, rural Latin American workers, organize a legal assistance office, because most lawyers refuse to represent campesinos against landlords, he said.

He also helped the campesinos produce comic books to explain land-reform problems and health care. He said comic books were good teaching aids because many of the people in the area could not read.

Moynihan also taught campesinos how to produce radio programs for a local radio station, one of many projects which made him unpopular with government and military officials, he said.

"These are all things I've been involved in and, of course, these are all things that hit against the government," he said.

Moynihan said many people, including some within the Bolivian military have told him priests should not get involved in politics.

Organization preserves Student architects to work in Greece interests of left-handers

By The Collegian Staff

If you shake hands with Dean Campbell of Manhattan, you're in for a big surprise.

Campbell, founder and publisher of Lefthanders International, always offers his left hand instead of his right in a handshake, a sign of the seriousness with which he takes his organization.

"The purpose of the group is to focus on the good life of left-handedness," Campbell said. "The reason for that is that there's so many stigmas attached to being left-handed."

Campbell said left-handers suffer continually in a world dominated by right-handers.

"In products you get picked on, in public restrooms you get picked on, and some people even get picked on sitting at the dining room table," he said.

The organization, which serves the needs and interests of left-handers worldwide, has grown to include 35,000 members since its creation in 1974.

Campbell said the idea for an organization like this had occurred to him several times in the past, but he had always put it on the back burner.

Since starting LHI, Campbell said the organization has shifted its focus and emphasized helping left-handers find products to suit their needs.

"We started out trying to stay away from selling products because there were other organizations that handled that, but we found that a lot of people just couldn't get the things they needed," he said.

Campbell said many people take things used within the classroom for granted, and that left-handers' needs are not being met when it comes to desks and notebooks.

"If I were to invent a product," Campbell said, "I would at least take time to make sure it was compatible with both left- and right-handers."

LHI's publication, Lefthander magazine, recognizes left-handers' accomplishments in the areas of sports, entertainment, the arts and the working world. The magazine is bound on the right side and each article reads from right to left.

While many K-State students are at home this summer working to pay for next year's school, or just basking in the sun, seven students will be working on an architectural project in Greece.

Beginning June 28, these students will be joining K-State faculty and other students from the United States, Canada and West Germany on an architectural design studio in the village of Epidaurus, located 2½ hours from Athens, Greece.

Eleftherios Pavlides, assistant professor of environmental design and one of the faculty going to Greece, said the six-week, six-credit course is an intercultural design studio where students will confront the problem of designing in a cultural context very different from their own.

The class' project will be to design a resort and international convention center of world significance to be located on a forested hill one-half mile from the small fishing village.

"The goal will be to develop the site in harmony with the physical beauty of the land and nearby village, and also to recapture the healing magic of ancient Epidaurus, which was the most famous healing center of ancient Greece," said Pavlides, who was born and raised in Athens.

"I look at it as a good opportunity to get acquainted with other people in the field in different areas from different walks of life," said Bill Wilson, senior in architecture, who is going on the trip. "It will be a good opportunity to go back to the basics, seeing how the Greeks began architecture."

Wilson also said he is excited about working with the high-quality students who make up the class.

"I don't think there is a university that has a class of this high quality," Pavlides said.

Outside of the work the students do for the class, they will have the opportunity to participate in excursions to many of the famous ancient archaeological sites.

Pavlides said they will be able to swim in the sea, hike in the hills and visit ancient ruins.

Wilson said he looks forward to sightseeing the most.

But for Pavlides, the most interesting part will be the review, which he said is the most interesting part of any architectural studio.

"But it's even more interesting here, because you have the local community that can be part of those. You have the foreign architects and you have all these different students," he said. "That is going to be very exciting."

Not only are the participants excited for the class, but Pavlides said the town is also very excited about the students coming. The hotel at which they are staying has already put potted plants in all the balconies "in anticipation," he said.

Pavlides said the mayor is providing studio space, and the mayor's uncle, who owns the hotel in which the students will be staying, has said it is their highest priority to do anything to help them.

The project is much more than just a resort or a convention center, he said. It's a statement that has an central issue.

"We say the central issue in our times is the reintegration of body and mind," Pavlides said. "It's not just a resort place. It's a place for athletics and culture."

The center will be designed with the idea in mind that for the human to excel, it needs to be in an atmosphere where it will be both physically and mentally stimulating. He said this is the ancient Greek ideal.

Pavlides said a new idea in American culture is the idea that a person is being socially good if he is taking care of himself.

"This is a new idea in our culture," he said. "Ideas need symbols to represent them and architecture is one of the symbols for big ideas to our society."

"You have the big government building to give us the idea of government. You have churches to give us the idea of religion," he said. This resort is to show the idea of both culture and body connecting to its roots in ancient times.

"The ancient Greeks provide us with an example of a culture that had this (idea) integrated," Pavlides said.

Charges to stand

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal appellate court ruled Monday that lobbyist Michael K. Deaver must stand trial on perjury charges, refusing to accept his appeal of a pre-trial ruling in the case.

The U.S. Court of Appeals ruled that Deaver could not appeal the trial judge's denial of his motion to dismiss the indictment on the ground that independent counsel Whitney North Seymour Jr. had no authority to prosecute the case.

Lawyers for Deaver, a former top aide to President Reagan, said in advance of Monday's decision that they planned to take any adverse ruling to Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Consideration of such an appeal by Rehnquist or the full Supreme Court could further delay the start of a trial.

Deaver had sought to have the appellate court rule on his challenge to the constitutionality of the Ethics in Government Act, which provides for judicial appointment of independent counsels.

But the court refused to accept Deaver's appeal of U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson's decision, saying the lower court's ruling "is not a final order, and therefore is unappealable."

"We find no reason to make an exception in this case," the court said in the order for Judges Harry Edwards, James Buckley and Stephen Williams.

Deaver, who resigned as deputy White House chief of staff in 1985, is charged with five counts of lying to a House subcommittee and a federal grand jury that investigated his lobbying business for possible ethics violations.

New college fund to help engineers

The Kansas Chapter of the American Public Works Association Scholarship has been established at K-State. The fund will benefit students in the College of Engineering and will be managed by the KSU Foundation.

The scholarship will be awarded to a junior enrolled in the civil engineering curriculum. Recipients must have a 3.0 GPA, leadership qualities and participate in extracurricular activities. The $500 annual scholarship is renewable during the student's senior year.

Alumnus donates million-dollar gift

LeRoy Paslay donated a portion of his lifetime investments to establish a $1 million gift for K-State.

A native of Manhattan, Paslay earned his undergraduate degree from K-State in 1930 and completed his masters in 1934. He was awarded an honorary doctorate of science last December and has received the College of Engineering's Distinguished Service Award. His wife earned a bachelor's degree from the College of Home Economics in 1930.

The couple are members of the Benefactor's Circle, the Foundation's most exclusive donor group. Paslay was a major supporter of the Durland Hall Phase II campaign, and the building's 180-seat lecture hall carries his name. They have also established a number of scholarship programs and created an endowed professorship at K-State.

Journal examines theories in design

Oz, a publication produced by K-State architecture students, has achieved a reputation for excellence by soliciting articles for publication from well-known architects around the world.

The ninth volume of Oz, the journal of the College of Architecture and Design, contains design projects and articles exploring theoretical issues in architecture.

The journal features award-winning K-State student entries in design competitions, as well as articles by American architects and professionals in London, West Germany and Australia.

Californian gives to business center

Robert Chapman, of Whittier, Calif., has donated funds for three complete computer operations to the Small Business Development Center.

The new computers will aid the center in educating people about getting started in small business.

The computers will also provide means for individual counseling and low-cost training programs. Most services of the center are free.

Students confront riot police in Seoul

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — Students poured off campuses to fight riot police with rocks and firebombs Monday and thousands of people marched from a church through the capital, chanting "Rise up! Rise up!"

Students fought police in at least eight other cities in the sustained and violent campaign against President Chun Doo-hwan's authoritarian government that began last Wednesday.

Massed ranks of riot police fired thousands of tear gas grenades. Armored cars moved in to stop the onrushing waves of students.

"Destroy the military dictatorship!" the attackers shouted as they charged police lines, flinging rocks and gasoline bombs that exploded in showers of flame.

Several police units were overrun. Authorities said more than 200 officers were injured or beaten.

Mobs of students attacked at least five police stations in various cities and burned tear gas rifles, shields and other gear seized from police in street battles. Protesters trapped and beat a unit of 43 officers in Yongin, south of Seoul.

Attacks on and beatings of police have become commonplace since the protests began last week to coincide with a convention of Chun's ruling Democratic Justice Party that endorsed his choice of fellow ex-general Roh Tae-woo to succeed him as president next February.

Critics of the government demand democratic reforms including direct presidential elections, which Chun has refused. He says his successor should be chosen under the existing electoral college system, which opponents say favors the incumbent party.

A new coalition of political, religious and human rights leaders with the announced purpose of rallying the "power of the masses" against the government called for the current nationwide campaign of protest.

Scores of people were injured Monday in Seoul and many others were seen being arrested. Officials would not provide casualty or arrest figures for the capital or other cities.

Huge demonstrations continued around the Roman Catholic Myongdong Cathedral in Seoul.

Legislature into funding it, Hoyt said.

Unlike previous years, this year the Board of Regents gave the University a base figure from which to work. Before this, the schools had no idea of how much the regents would allow, and often the budgets were drastically slashed, Hoyt said.

"Now we know how much the board will go to bat for us in the Legislature," he said.

Before, the administration would develop a general idea of how much money was needed for each department. Other costs were added to the figure to make the final budget. But, Hoyt said, the University's request to the Board of Regents was always higher than what was estimated.

"It was more a bargaining figure than an actual budget," he said. "We had to ask for more, or else we would not get enough when all the debate was over."

After the regents heard a school's request, they altered the request — usually cutting it. Then, a budget request was submitted to the Kansas Legislature to fund the schools for the coming fiscal year.

While in the Legislature, the budget was again subject to cutting or adding to satisfy the Legislature. The schools had to "sell" their budget to the Legislature because to add to one school often meant cutting from another.

When the state was finished with the budget, the universities were told how much they had been allotted, and it was up to them to prioritize for what the money should be used.

Hoyt said strategic planning will not eliminate all the political haggling. But it will make the universities more prepared to present their plans, which will be more persuasive because they are well thought out, he said.

Manhattan chapter of NFD, said one of the main purposes of the picketing was to make people aware of pornography.

"We are not against all R-rated movies, but many of the movies which have an R-rating are very explicit and show acts which defame women and children.

"What we are protesting is the rating of these movies," Roberts said. "We are also concerned about the individual who watches this type of film (and) gets so excited that he is prompted to go out and commit a crime."

Roberts and his wife Lori formed the local chapter of the organization after becoming aware of the "proliferation" of pornographic materials that could easily be viewed by children.

"We became concerned when there was such an abundance of magazines and so forth that were in full view in grocery and convenience stores," he said.

Roberts started the group, which now consists of 125 families on a mailing list, in August 1986. He said the group has a wide variety of members, including "everyone from construction workers to college professors."

Roberts said the organization supports individuals in their right to voice their feelings on pornography.

"We, as individuals, have our rights. Most people are so confused because the waters (laws concerning pornography) are muddled.

"They don't believe their one voice can have an impact on anything anymore, that they can go in and really make a difference by speaking to a store manager and asking him, 'Why do you have this in here?' It offends me," and asking him in a kind way to remove it."

Crew examines suspect in TWA hijacking case

By The Associated Press

FRANKFURT, West Germany — Crew members of a TWA jet hijacked to Beirut in 1985 viewed a jailed suspect Monday whose extradition is sought by the United States, but official sources did not say whether they identified him.

West German security sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Mohammed Ali Hamadi, a Lebanese Shiite Moslem held in Frankfurt since January, was shown to Americans who were among the crew of TWA Flight 847 when it was hijacked in June 1985.

U.S. Navy diver Robert Stethem was killed by the hijackers and 39 Americans were held hostage in Beirut for 17 days.

The sources would not say how many Americans viewed Hamadi, 22, or whether any identified him as one of the hijackers.

In Bonn, government spokesmen and the U.S. Embassy were silent about the visit. The government has maintained a news blackout on Hamadi, who was arrested at the Frankfurt airport in January after explosives were found in his luggage, and the subsequent kidnappings of two West Germans in Lebanon.

Washington seeks Hamadi's extradition for trial on charges of murder and air piracy. West Germany has moved slowly on the request, filed five months ago, because of the two German businessmen held by Shiites in Lebanon as hostages in exchange for Hamadi.

A West German army helicopter landed at the Frankfurt prison where Hamadi is held Monday, took off after seven minutes and returned later. The security sources would not say whether it carried the TWA crew members to the prison or flew Hamadi to another location.

Prison officials and the Frankfurt prosecutor's office refused to answer questions from reporters, citing the official blackout.

Friedhelm Ost, chief spokesman for Chancellor Helmut Kohl's government, said last week there had been no decision on whether to extradite Hamadi or try him on charges in West Germany.

WASHINGTON — The Cuban general who defected to the United States last month has told U.S. interrogators that 10,000 Cuban troops have been killed in Angola since 1976, according to senior administration officials.

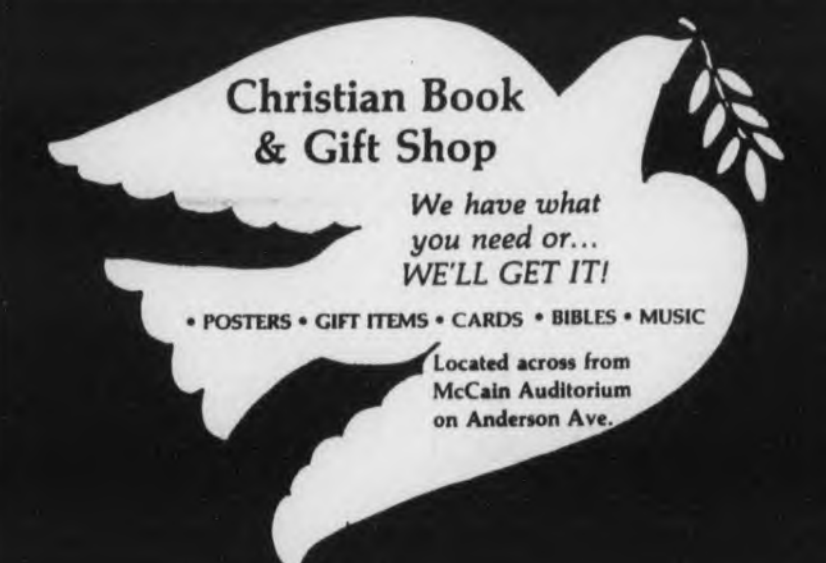

The estimate by Brig. Gen. Rafael del Pino Diaz is the first authoritative figure the United States has received on Cuban casualties in Angola but the officials said it was roughly the same as American calculations.

Over the years, Cuba has kept a tight hold on information about casualties in Angola, never referring to the subject publicly.

If the estimate of del Pino is accurate, it would mean that Cuban losses in Angola are proportionately much higher than American manpower sacrifices in Vietnam. There were slightly more than 50,000 U.S. servicemen killed in Vietnam, but the U.S. population is about 22 times the size of Cuba's.

Jonas Savimbi, leader of the U.S.-backed anti-communist rebels in Angola, said last year that the number of Cuban dead in Angola totaled 6,200 as of 1984.

States review fee agreement

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

Kansas and Missouri have had for years an agreement allowing students from each state to attend universities in the other and pay in-state tuition. That agreement is being renegotiated because Kansas has decided it is not financially beneficial.

The agreement between the two states was initiated in 1965 to allow students in Kansas to enroll in specific academic programs at one of the University of Missouri campuses for the same cost a Missouri resident would pay. Conversely, Missouri students could enroll in certain programs at one of the Kansas institutions while paying in-state tuition.

The academic programs covered under the agreement are ones only offered in one of the states. For example, Kansas does not have a school of dentistry, and Missouri does not have a university offering architecture.

Mark Lapping, dean of College of Architecture and Design, said the creation of a reciprocal program was a bright thing to do.

"It was a very wise thing to do," Lapping said. "Rather than every state creating its own programs and essentially duplicating other states, they said, 'Let's pool our resources.'"

Programs offered under the agreement range from bachelor's to doctoral degrees. Kansas students enroll in Missouri programs in dental hygiene and surgery, atmospheric sciences, forestry and five engineering majors: ceramic, management, geological, metallurgical and mining.

Missouri students can study any of the programs in architecture for in-state-tuition fees at K-State or the University of Kansas. K-State's interior and landscape architecture programs are unique in the region.

Missourians can attend K-State to earn degrees in bakery science and management, feed science and management, milling science and management, grain science and horticulture therapy. In addition, the reciprocal agreement covers linguistics, music therapy, oriental languages and literature, and Slavic languages and literature at KU.

Problems with the Agreement

When the agreement was first initiated, the number of students in each state interested in attending school in the other state was evenly balanced, and the resulting financial burden was equal for both states.

But the situation has changed. Martine Hammond, director of academic affairs for the Kansas Board of Regents, said the problem now is a result of monetary inequity, centering around the reciprocity between dentistry and architecture due to a growing imbalance in the number of students enrolling in those programs. Over the years, the number of students entering the architectural programs has increased, but the number of dental students has decreased.

"The agreement will not continue under the current conditions," she said.

The Kansas Legislature appropriates $40,000 annually to permit Kansas who want to study dentistry to attend the University of Missouri at Kansas City. However, Hammond said, when the most recent appropriation was made last spring, the Legislature indicated it would be the last.

Robert S. Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said the $40,000 is paid to Missouri as a token compensation for having 35 seats per class reserved at UMKC every year for Kansas students. This adds up to a total of 140 Kansas dental students.

Krause said MU claims the cost of educating a dentist is $10,000 a year, and that UMKC is losing money through the agreement by not charging Kansas out-of-state tuition.

"Their current posture is that the way the current program is set up, they're on the short end," he said.

Kansas receives no funding from Missouri to compensate for the loss of out-of-state tuition that could be

Canines 'heel' to fitness in whirlpool

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

A cocker spaniel, recovering from a broken pelvis, was lowered into the swirling water of the whirlpool as a part of his physical therapy.

"People ask me what I do, and they say, 'Whirlpool? Dogs? Whirlpool on dogs?' They just don't believe it, but it's true — we do," said Evelyn Henton, animal caretaker at the Veterinary Hospital.

Henton, who has been with K-State for 19 years, uses the whirlpool to heal dogs with back or leg injuries.

"Some dogs fight it, but many don't," she said. "Many enjoy it."

Henton said the whirlpool can be "very frustrating or very rewarding." She said she can work with an animal day after day and see no improvement. Then one day she may feel a little movement on a leg, or a tail may start to wag.

"It's great to see them go out of here, and they can walk," Henton said.

But whirlpools are not all Henton does at the hospital. Her day starts at 7 a.m. when she feeds the small animals in the hospital. She said she doesn't feed by calculations, but by how she "feels."

"Evelyn can walk through the wards, look at a patient and decide how much or what to feed them. It's a skill that takes many years to develop," said Bill Fortney, assistant professor of veterinary surgery and medicine.

Henton said she must be careful and watch for special instructions. But she permits students to feed the animals medications and special feeds.

Henton then checks the chalkboard for doctors' instructions about tasks to complete that day.

"My job is so interesting because I never know what I'll be doing that day," she said. "There may be a day I'll feel like I won't get everything done and other days will be slow."

Henton said she starts the whirlpools early in the day because it is so time consuming. To fill the whirlpool tub takes 15 to 20 minutes, the whirlpool itself another 25 minutes to prepare. Emptying the tub takes from 15 to 20 minutes.

Once the canine is in the water, Henton massages the legs or back of the dog and helps it walk inside the tub. Water helps take the weight off the legs, making them easier for the dog to move, she said, while the whirlpool helps prevent bedsores the animal acquires from laying in its cage day after day.

Besides using the whirlpool to help dogs move, Henton said she uses a special canvas sling on wheels to stand a dog on its feet. An alternative to using the equipment is having a student wrap a towel under a dog's abdomen and lift the hindquarters, allowing the dog to take steps.

Fortney said it is important to get the dog to walk again because a paralyzed dog is usually an unacceptable pet.

Goetz trial raises questions of citizens' rights to self-defense

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A jury made a specific finding: The state failed to prove Bernhard Goetz guilty of attempted murder or assault in the subway shooting of four young men 2½ years ago. But the broader issues raised by the case remained unsettled Wednesday.

As Goetz's partisans proclaimed his vindication, legal experts insisted Tuesday's verdict in no way expanded a citizen's right to self-defense, sanctioned vigilantism or endorsed a right to carry handguns.

"New York law is no different today that it was the day before the verdict," said Thomas Reppetto, director of the Citizens' Crime Commission.

"All a verdict of 'not guilty' means is that, in the opinion of 12 jurors, the prosecution failed to meet its evidentiary burden," said Joseph Jaffe, chairman of the state bar association's criminal justice committee. "It doesn't make law or break law, or set any precedent."

Public opinion was something else.

Each of the four young men Goetz shot had a criminal record, and each was black. Goetz's defenders claimed the verdict sent criminals a message.

"This jury has sent a message to all decent people that it's OK to fight back," said Curtis Sliwa, head of the Guardian Angels, a civilian patrol group largely composed of blacks and Hispanics.

"The correct signal has been sent to the criminals that they can't hide under the criminal justice system," said Roy Innis, director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

But Major Owens, a black congressman from Brooklyn, described a different result: "The hysteria in the white community will be, 'Yeah, we were right, let's go get 'em.'"

"We will continue to see open season on the killing of young black men," agreed Hazel Dukes, president of the state NAACP.

"We fear that the judgment sends dangerous messages to those who might be motivated by racism, vigilantism or urban survivalist mentalities," state Assemblyman Roger Green, chairman of the Black and Puerto Rican Legislative Caucus, said in Albany.

About 25 people under the auspices of the Revolutionary Communist Party demonstrated outside Goetz's apartment building Wednesday, chanting: "Goetz is Archie Bunker with a gun; the long hot summer has just begun!"

The jurors themselves disclaimed any meaning beyond Goetz's innocence of the charges against him.

"We weren't trying to send a message to the public," said juror

Diana Serpe. "The verdict doesn't reflect our opinions about what Goetz did or about actions such as that. I hope the public understands that."

"People are going to take this one way or another," shrugged juror James Mosley. "If you call it racism, you have that right, but racism had no part in it."

The jurors convicted Goetz only on one gun possession charge. Defense lawyer Barry Slotnick said he would make no decision Wednesday on whether to file an appeal.

Novelist Sheldon finds area 'helpful' for book research

By PEGGY SHANDY
Collegian Reporter

For K-State, being surrounded by small towns isn't such a bad thing. In fact, it was the type of atmosphere writer Sidney Sheldon was looking for when doing research for the novel "Windmills of the Gods."

Sheldon came to the Manhattan area two years ago to begin research for the book, which was released in February.

Local interest has soared in the novel since its release. Forty people are on the waiting list at Farrell Library for the book. Other Manhattan stores have had trouble keeping the novel in stock.

Sheldon said he does all his research even before he has a plot in mind. He has traveled throughout the world researching the atmosphere and location for each of his books, and his excursions have taken him to India, the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia and England.

Sheldon said he decided his new character should be from a small town and have small-town values.

"In getting a heroine from a small town, I picked the place from a map on my office wall. I picked a place in the center which just happened to be Junction City," Sheldon said.

"After writing for information from the editor of the local paper and reading information from the Chamber of Commerce, I couldn't smell the place nor feel the atmosphere. So it required a visit to the town," Sheldon said.

Several phone calls, letters and two plane trips later, Sheldon was in Junction City to begin his research. He visited local businesses, as well as the Geary County Community Hospital, Fort Riley and the Milford Lake area.

North refuses to talk before panel

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, in a surprise move that sharpened the adversarial nature of the Iran-Contra probe, refused Wednesday to undergo private congressional questioning that was to set the stage for later public testimony.

Leaders of the Senate investigating panel said there would be no effort to cite North for contempt of Congress as a way of forcing him to testify now. Such a move, they said, could delay North's public appearance, expected in mid-July, or even mean he would never tell his story to Congress at all.

However, Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., chairman of the House committee, said at a news conference that his panel has yet to decide whether North should be cited for contempt at this point. He said a vote on that could come Thursday.

Rep. Richard Cheney, R-Wyo., the House committee's vice chairman, said legal papers filed with the committee by North's attorneys "reiterate North's desire to testify in public session. I take them at their word."

Earlier Wednesday, in an interview, Hamilton said it is too early to conclude that President Reagan is in the clear in the Iran-Contra affair, as Reagan suggested on Tuesday with a declaration that "there ain't no smoking gun" linking him to a diversion of Iran arms-sale profits to the Nicaraguan rebels.

"We don't understand things like whose idea it was to start the diversion," Hamilton said. "Everybody's against it, but it happened. Somebody had the idea. Somebody pushed it through."

"We certainly don't know the answer to the question the press has been most interested in, and that's the president's knowledge. We've got a lot of things we haven't resolved at this point."

And Hamilton, following up on comments he made last weekend, said there are "multiple possibilities" that could lead to congressional pressure for impeachment, other than the discovery of diversion evidence that would constitute a "smoking gun." He declined to elaborate.

As for North, Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, chairman of the Senate Iran-Contra panel, said concern about long delays would keep him from recommending a move to force North to submit to private questioning.

Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., the Senate committee's vice chairman, said one reason for the North's action might be to lure Congress into voting contempt, purposely causing delays.

"If you delay it long enough, you

Lawyer names Nazis' victims

LYON, France — Serge Klarsfeld intoned the names of 44 Jewish children sent to the ovens of Auschwitz in closing his final argument Wednesday at the trial of Klaus Barbie, the wartime Nazi Gestapo chief of Lyon.

"Sami did not return... Hans did not return... Sarah did not return," the lawyer, a Jew who narrowly escaped the ovens himself, said as mothers wept in the front row.

The Gestapo arrested the children April 6, 1944, at a home in Izieu, 40 miles east of Lyon, where they had been sent to escape the Nazis. Their ages ranged from 5 to 17 and none returned from Auschwitz, a death camp in Nazi-occupied Poland during World War II.

Barbie, 73, became known as the "butcher of Lyon." He is accused of arresting, torturing and deporting hundreds of Jews and members of the French Resistance to Nazi concentration or extermination camps in 1942-44.

Klarsfeld, 52, and his wife Beate, who is German, have made a career of tracking down former Nazis. The lawyer escaped arrest and deportation as a boy by hiding in a double-walled closet.

He is representing 87 of 129 civil parties to the trial, along with attorney Charles Libman. Klarsfeld was the first of 39 civil party lawyers who will present closing arguments through the end of next week. Prosecution and defense arguments follow.

Officials warn of Gulf attacks

WASHINGTON — Intelligence officials have warned that Iran might sponsor terrorist attacks against U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf in a way that would be difficult to trace back to Tehran, congressional sources said Wednesday.

The CIA has told the Senate and House Armed Services Committees that there is only a relatively low probability that the Islamic fundamentalist nation will directly attack U.S. Navy ships or U.S.-protected Kuwaiti tankers, said the sources, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Instead, Iran is likely to strike at ships which won't be protected by the U.S. Navy or to try to hit the U.S. ships in a manner that couldn't be directly tied to Iran, the sources said.

Democrats set federal budget

WASHINGTON — House and Senate Democrats reached a tentative agreement Wednesday on their $1 trillion budget for fiscal 1988, House Speaker Jim Wright said.

"I think we've got an agreement," Wright, D-Texas, told reporters following the latest in a series of meetings with Senate Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., and other congressional leaders.

House Majority Leader Thomas S. Foley, D-Wash., said he was "very optimistic" and that only some minor matters remained. "The details are being, as they say, massaged," he said.

The House and Senate each approved spending plans with similar themes — a tax increase to reduce the deficit, restraints on military spending and rejection of the deep domestic spending cuts President Reagan requested.

However, final passage of a compromise fiscal blueprint has been delayed for weeks because liberals and conservatives in the Democratic Party disagreed on the precise level of defense spending.

The Democrats' plan would not meet the mandate of the Gramm-Rudman budget-balancing law, because it would not reduce the deficit to $108 billion in fiscal 1988. Even with deficit reductions, through taxes and spending cuts, in the neighborhood of $36 billion, the budget would leave more than $130 billion in red ink.

Reagan said he met the target with the budget he submitted, but administration officials conceded recently that their own estimates put his deficit at $27 billion over the limit.

Panel approves water projects

WASHINGTON — A House panel approved a bill Wednesday to finance continued construction of two water projects in Kansas and pay for engineering for a proposed reservoir in Butler County.

The money is part of a $16.1 billion energy and water development bill endorsed by the Appropriations Committee. The full House could take up the measure next week.

In Kansas, the bill provides: — $1.6 million for work on a flood control project at Great Bend. Congress provided $1.5 million last year to start construction for the project, which was authorized in 1965. It calls for building levees along Walnut Creek, Little Walnut Creek and the Arkansas River.

— $500,000 for construction on a flood control project at Halstead. Lawmakers provided $1.1 million to begin construction last year. The proposed work includes a levee and floodwall along the Little Arkansas River as well as deepening and widening the river channel.

— $500,000 for engineering and design work on the proposed Douglas Reservoir, which would be about 20 miles southeast of Wichita. The project, which was authorized in 1965, would provide flood control, recreation and water supplies to the area.

Four bonds set in Riley death

JUNCTION CITY, — Bonds were set in Geary County District Court Wednesday for three women and a man arrested on probable cause charges in connection with the fatal stabbing of a Fort Riley soldier.

Bonds ranged from $10,000 to $100,000 for the four Junction City residents arrested in connection with the Monday night slaying of Sgt. James H. Banks Jr., 30, of Brooklyn, who had been assigned to the base for about 10 months.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

CAMPUS ORGANIZATIONS are encouraged to use Campus Bulletin. All announcements must be submitted by 11 a.m. the day before publication. Announcements for Tuesday's bulletin must be in by 11 a.m. Monday. Information forms are available at the table outside Kedzie 103. Forms should be left in the mailbox at the table after being filled out. All submissions must be signed and are subject to verification.

CAREER PLANNING AND PLACEMENT reminds those who will be completing requirements for their degrees in the summer to report employment or other plans if firm, or solicit help in Holtz Hall if seeking employment.

Geary County Attorney Steve Opat said formal charges would be filed later.

Banks, a teletype equipment repairman, was found face down in a ditch in a Junction City residential area Monday night. He was pronounced dead at a hospital.

Opat said it appeared the stabbing "started pretty much from a domestic incident. 'I think it may have evolved into more than that, at least from what I've been told.'"

Stephan wants to halt dealers

MANHATTAN — Society is punishing the wrong people in trying to stop the flow of illegal drugs, Kansas Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Wednesday.

Stephan, speaking at a weeklong state-sponsored conference on substance abuse prevention, said judges should concentrate more on giving harsh sentences to dealers than to recreational drug users.

Experimental drug users often go to jail after they are caught, but judges sometimes still will not deal harshly with a person who gets "caught with a pound of cocaine and $15,000 cash on his way back from Colorado," Stephan said.

Stopping the flow of illegal drugs also will take international cooperation, Stephan said.

"We know where the drugs are coming from," he said. "We're just not getting the cooperation we should from those countries."

Stephan urged more than 100 teachers, school administrators and community leaders to get to children early to prevent them from using drugs. He said he is encouraged by reports that drug use among children has declined.

Moscow's air chief fired from position

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The chief of Moscow's air defenses has been dismissed, the Soviet army newspaper said Wednesday in a report that blasted his organization for laxity that apparently let a 19-year-old West German land a small plane in Red Square.

The Defense Ministry daily Red Star did not say whether Marshal Anatoly I. Konstantinov had been replaced before or after Mathias Rust's unauthorized flight from Finland to Moscow.

It said only that Col. Gen. V. Tsarkov had assumed the post "recently." But the article referred to the "violation of Soviet airspace," an apparent reference to Rust's flight.

Rust crossed hundreds of miles of Soviet airspace on May 28, buzzed Red Square and landed his Cessna unchallenged beside the Kremlin, the seat of Soviet power. The area is closed to all air traffic.

The army newspaper also said several other top-ranking officers in the Moscow district — including two lieutenant generals, a major general and a colonel — were expelled from the Communist Party.

Some Western military attaches said the biting, sometimes sardonic report was the toughest criticism of high-level Soviet commanders they had ever seen in the country's state-run media.

"They're accusing these people of nepotism, capriciousness and secretiveness," said one Moscow-based attaché who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"Clearly retribution of some sort or another is due to take place, but this is also a signal to the entire military to fall in line behind the reforms," he said.

Since Mikhail S. Gorbachev became Soviet leader in March 1985, he has pressed for tighter discipline and increased efficiency and declared that all members of the vast Soviet bureaucracy will be held responsible for their actions.

The paper, reporting on a recent meeting of the top party members from the air defense district, said the district under Konstantinov proved unable to translate party directives into concrete actions. It also said Tsarkov had not taken "urgent measures" quickly enough to rectify the situation.

"It's very difficult to tell from the article who was where at what time," said another defense attaché. "On one hand, Tsarkov comes in for criticism. On the other, it's unlikely he would have remained in place if he had been the one who let the plane through."

Strategic planning program places emphasis on sciences

By CHRIS DOLL
Campus Editor

Editor's note: This is the first in a nine-part series dealing with the five-year strategic plan for the University's colleges.

Strategic planning challenges the College of Arts and Sciences to put more emphasis on the sciences, especially research, while not diminishing the quality of the other curriculums.

The five-year planning program gives high priority to physics, chemistry, biology and biochemistry, said William Stamey, dean of the college. Closely following were the programs of mathematics, statistics and computer science.

Money poses a threat for these objectives. Stamey said people usually support increases in funding for the college to ensure a strong academic center.

"(But) when it gets to the nitty gritty of it, people who have a particular interest say, 'First, should be mine. Second, should be a strong arts and sciences college,' he said.

The new emphasis does not mean more money for the college or the science departments.

"There was less taken away from research than other areas — not more given to them," he said.

One option the administration gave the college was to reallocate money from other programs to devote to research. This was not seriously considered, Stamey said.

"We have a responsibility for a total education," he said. "I would not sacrifice a department for the math program."

One reason for this, Stamey said, is because the college "is central to all others."

"In engineering, about one-half of the first two years' courses are in the arts and sciences college," he said. "If good things don't happen in that half, then the rest of the education will hurt because of it."

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

The individual departments in the college depend on its programs because most curriculums require students to take a majority of classes in sciences and humanities.

"If one-fourth of your education is excellent, but the other three-fourths of it is only mediocre then you have been short-changed," he said.

Another reason humanities probably will not be cut is the renewed interest in general education, Stamey said. In fact, the strategic planning study examined the college's core classes and recommended improvements to them. Core classes are the basic courses required by most curriculums such as English Composition I, Concepts of Physical Education and Public Speaking.

One way to improve the classes is to improve the program itself to provide incentives to potential professors, Stamey said.

"A quality faculty won't come to teach history to only non-history majors," Stamey said. "They would want to be able to teach higher-level history students, too."

K-State faculty are tired of waiting for increases in salaries and are beginning to take other jobs, he said. Two physics professors have "offers in hand that dwarf what K-State is offering," and four physical education instructors are expected to resign, Stamey said.

Margin of Excellence, part of strategic planning, aims to boost faculty salaries to the average salary at peer institutions. Under the program, K-State will raise its salaries about 8 percent.

Stamey said the increase "cannot be overemphasized," but questioned if it was enough.

"Being at the average of our peers would not mean being a leader. Even if we were to achieve that goal, we would be up with the premiere institutions," he said. "It would just stem the downside."

Higher salaries would not only draw more faculty to K-State, but it could mean retaining professors. Stamey said K-State loses professors when they are at their "prime" in terms of research and teaching because they receive better offers. To replace them, the University must hire younger teachers because K-State can pay them lower starting salaries.

"It's like we're a farm club for other universities, and some of them we wouldn't even consider in the major leagues," Stamey said.

Like all programs, he said, the college's science departments could use more money, but fortunately the programs are strong and all have enough faculty except computer science, which added

First day enrollment numbers high as new orientation program starts

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

In order to combat the new-kid-on-the-block syndrome, the Office of Admissions has begun conducting a new orientation and enrollment program to welcome new K-Staters.

Under the direction of Marilyn Trotter, director of new student programs, the orientation process is more informal and broader. And it started off with a bang.

"Our first day, we had more than 400 students," said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement and director of enrollment management. "That day we enrolled our highest number of students of any day in the past five years."

The numbers are definitely up compared with previous years, but University officials are remaining "cautiously optimistic," he said.

"We won't know for sure until the 20th day of classes. But, the numbers are looking good," said Amy Jo Reinhardt, admissions representative.

Enrollment for new students began June 12 and will continue on Tuesdays through Saturdays until July 11. About 250 students are estimated to participate each day.

The new students arrive and assemble in Union Forum Hall, where they receive a white vinyl packet with "K-State" imprinted across the front. The packet contains a general catalog, a line schedule, a new student guide and calendar, a Willie the Wildcat notepad and pencil and a Union meal ticket.

The opening session includes a welcome by Bosco and, occasionally, a visit from President Jon Wefald. Informational presentations are given on housing, greek organizations and student health services.

A "sales pitch" on ways to get involved at K-State is given by Student Body President Kent Bradley, senior in nutrition science.

For the next session, students are divided into groups for a workshop with one of the admissions representatives.

The representative speaks about specific courses in the University, the actual costs involved, figuring grade point averages, safety instructions for campus, and maybe offers some personal advice or suggestions for entertainment, Reinhardt said.

"I spend most of my time going over the enrollment process," she said. "Most people don't know how to use a line schedule."

Meanwhile, the parents are attending other sessions at which they learn about financial assistance programs, insurance and housing options.

One of the parents, Carol Lindsay, Neodesha, thought the medical information was beneficial.

"I also enjoyed the panel of parents with children already at K-State," Lindsay said. "Three mothers told about their experiences with their children."

Her daughter, Sheri Lindsay, said she remembered K-State Admissions Counselor Dana Fincher from the College Career Night held in southeast Kansas.

The new enrollment process was intended to build upon the recruitment efforts and enrollment management initiated by President Wefald.

"It is part of the entire strategy and job description that President Wefald outlined when we started working last year," Reinhardt said.

The admissions representatives attempted to visit each high school in their territory, and then follow-up by meeting any of those students who visited the campus.

"By assisting the students with enrollment, they are seeing a familiar face all the way through," Reinhardt said.

Plans have been made for a freshman orientation class, which will be taught by the admissions representatives during the first four weeks of classes. In addition, the class will have several guest lecturers.

"We think that will be the crucial time for the students we made contact with," Reinhardt said.

The class is not mandatory, however, and some students were not asked to participate because their college has its own specific program for freshmen.

"We had a good response for the class before enrollment," Reinhardt said. "That way we could already list the class on their schedule for their adviser."

Individual colleges handle the actual advising and enrolling differently. Most departments will have computer terminals on hand this year, rather than sending the students to the lines in Farrell Library.

Becky Chaulk, Marysville, attended the session for the College of Business Administration before lunch.

"The speaker was very good, and it was pretty informal," Chaulk said. "She outlined different classes for us and recommended we take between 15 and 17 hours."

Chaulk was meeting her sister to take advantage of the all-you-can-eat Union meal ticket provided to enrolling students.

South Korean situation calls for U.S. attention

Demonstrations and street fighting have flooded over the cities of South Korea this past week as students and thousands of other people protested a government they see growing more oppressive each day.

The demonstrations began last Wednesday when President Chun Doo Hwan persuaded a convention of his ruling Democratic Justice Party to support his choice of Roh Tae Woo to succeed him as president next year. This announcement prompted students to seize control of the Roman Catholic Myongdong Cathedral in downtown Seoul, setting off street riots and other demonstrations, both violent and peaceful.

The United States government has opted to use their familiar wait-and-see policy with regard to the violence in Seoul and throughout South Korea. All the while, students continue to throw stones and gasoline bombs at police who retaliate with tear gas.

It seems this situation needs more attention from our government than it is currently getting. The fact that the 1988 Summer Olympic Games are scheduled to open in Seoul in less than 15 months only highlights this need for action.

The basic conflict in Seoul is over what the government calls the Electoral College used in national elections. As it stands, the Electoral College is unbalanced and heavily favors the party in power. Thus, it is possible for President Chun to merely name his successor. A new coalition of political, religious and human rights leaders are seeking to change this and have asked the people of South Korea to take to the streets.

While this appears to be an amiable cause, our government has decided to shelve any action for the time being. This simply is not good enough. If we are to portray ourselves as a country of democracy, then it only seems right to support and aid those countries and causes which strive for an equally representative system. To turn a deaf ear to them is to turn away from our principles.

Our government officials must not sit on their hands. Riots in Seoul in 1980 resulted in police killing more than 200 demonstrators. This past week, police crowd control was only slightly more subtle, with more than 7,000 protesters being arrested. It is all too apparent that the claims by the people that their government is undemocratic and oppressive are accurate.

As talk of martial law echoes throughout the streets of Seoul, it is incumbent upon our government to make some attempt at establishing another type of dialogue — one involving both sides in the unrest. Perhaps talk in this country of trade sanctions or reductions in monetary aid will hasten this dialogue. Above all else, our government's wait-and-see policy must not turn into a wait-and-wait-and-wait-and-see policy, diluting the impact of any eventual action.

Testimony from North could satisfy questions

Now that a federal judge has ordered Lt. Col. Oliver North to testify before Congress on the Iran-Contra affair it appears that the public might finally get to hear his story. Just the same, doubts linger. This is the man who said, "I don't think there is another person in America who wants to tell his story as much as I do," when the scandal first broke. Since then, though, he has consistently refused to testify.

Up until now he has pleaded the Fifth Amendment. These actions are from a man who has been characterized by President Reagan as a "patriot" and praised by Fawn Hall for "his professional integrity and beliefs, and his personal commitment to this country."

Characterizing North as a patriot holds a certain irony. After all, the actions of the founding fathers were considered criminal and treasonous by the British. But we justify their actions because of the cause.

If we consider North in the same context, it suggests that it is permissible to act outside the law.

His initial actions show contempt for the law and channels of authority. Consider, for example, his altering and shredding of documents. Witness his refusal to testify without immunity. Recent developments indicate that even given this immunity he will refuse to testify in private to congressional lawyers. Instead he will testify only in public in July.

Given his past record, one has to wonder if North will even tell his story then. If he truly has the interests of his country at heart, he will testify and then, perhaps, we might see the end of this whole sordid mess.

Small choices show big ideals

Something we hear much about in this country is our "freedom of choice." It seems everyone from politicians to 7-Eleven advertisements are praising this valuable freedom. But what do these people mean? What is it that we are free to choose?

Are they referring to our choice between a Chevrolet and a Buick? If so, they're ignoring that in either case the money goes to General Motors, the world's largest corporation. Of course, we can choose not to buy from GM; we might choose to buy a Chrysler, for example, and thereby put the Chrysler Corp. back on its feet.

But regardless of whether we "choose" to put Chrysler "back on its feet" or not, we have already done so through taxes and government subsidies. In fact, Chrysler's president, Lee Iacocca, is so "back on his feet," that he earned a nice $23.6 million this year.

But maybe these people are referring to something more important than what make of car we drive; maybe they are referring to American "democracy" with its freedom to choose between Republican and Democratic candidates. (Never mind that their platforms usually aren't all that different.)

And sure, you can vote for a third party — nobody will stop you at the polls to check your ballot for orthodoxy. But you might have trouble getting the major media to let you know just what the various third parties are all about.

It's not that CBS News or The Washington Post don't have the resources to cover third parties, it's just that they are too busy running clips of Ronald Reagan chopping wood at his California ranch or stories about Richard Gephardt endorsing a bill to limit the colorization of black-and-white movies. Sure, that's interesting stuff, but it tends to limit the likelihood that you'll hear about Barry Commoner's Citizens Party and its plan to develop alternative energy sources.

But for all the flaws in American "democracy," I'll be the first to concede

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

there are some instances where we really do have meaningful choices. One of those instances, believe it or not, is deciding the ever-important question of what beer to drink. No kidding — it really makes a difference. For example, you might buy Miller beer, which is union made and, to my knowledge, the only domestic beer displaying the union label on every can or bottle.

On the other hand, you might choose Coors beer. The AFL-CIO has boycotted Coors since 1977 when the company busted 19 unions at its Golden, Colo., brewery. In the last decade, Coors has thwarted four attempts to organize the 7,000 workers at Golden.

Coors was a union shop for 42 years until 1977 when workers went on strike — not over low wages, but because of management's low regard for civil rights. Job applicants were submitted to lie detector tests in which they were asked such questions as: What are your sex preferences? How often do you change your underwear? Are you a homosexual? Are you a Communist?

Coors has also subjected workers to drug testing without probable cause. Apparently, Coors management failed to see the irony in a brewer worried about drug use. Coors has also volunteered its trucks to ship grapes and, thereby, help break a farmworkers strike.

Mexican-Americans organized a strike in 1967 to protest the company's lack of minority employees. David Sickler, a former Coors employee said of the '67 strike, "At that time, I was aware of only one black and approximately five Mexican-Americans within the brewery."

Coors also contributes to the Heritage Foundation and Jerry Falwell's Moral Majority, both of which backed Anita Bryant's late '70s anti-gay crusade. Not surprisingly, gay rights groups have organized a highly successful boycott of Coors. By the early 1980s, Coors' share of the San Francisco beer market went from 50 percent to 14 percent.

Yet, William Coors and his brother Joseph, who runs the company, never seem to learn. In 1984, William told a black audience that slave traders had done blacks a favor by "drag(ging) your ancestors over here in chains."

The company actively opposed the Equal Rights Amendment and in 1985, it sponsored a forum which advocated that AIDS victims be quarantined at a former leper colony. Last month, the joint congressional panels learned that Joseph Coors had contributed generously to the Contra terrorists in Nicaragua. As Harry Franklin of the New York Lesbian and Gay Labor Network said in a recent interview with the Guardian, Coors is "an equal opportunity discriminator. They hate everybody."

Unfortunately, Coors has enough money to buy out some of its most vocal opponents. The NAACP agreed to end its support for a boycott in exchange for a contribution; a former director of a Latino organization for a job as a Coors promoter; and David Goodstein, publisher of the national gay newspaper The Advocate, in exchange for advertising contracts.

So the moral of this column is that you don't necessarily have to be a racist, bigoted, male chauvinist corporate executive who supports military intervention in the Third World to drink Coors beer, but it certainly wouldn't hurt now that you know where your money is going.

Let's hear it for "freedom of choice."

Live a little—try something new

This past Wednesday I witnessed what I consider a beneficial evening for a group of small children and their parents. I saw them enjoying music together. No, it wasn't part of the latest Sesame Street Live production. They were listening to overtures and even a Sinatra medley as it was being rehearsed by the Manhattan Municipal Band.

The pseudo-concert resulted from the postponement of a Disney movie that was to be shown in City Park. Starting time for the movie was moved back one hour and to kill time the children and their parents sat in on the band's rehearsal.

The kids seemed to enjoy the sounds they were hearing, if for no other reason than that they were different from the usual blab coming from the family television set. A few danced, many sat wide-eyed and even parents were tapping their feet. It struck me that this music was something most of them had not heard in a long time, if they had heard it at all.

I suppose it's that way for most everybody. Keeping up with the same old routine can be exhausting in its own right, let alone squeezing in anything extra. But why not try something unusual for a change? Granted, Manhattan isn't overflowing with high-brow culture like a major metropolitan area, but the unusual can be had. All that's needed is a little searching.

The trouble is, taking the time to search for something different rubs against the grain of human nature. Topics such as ballet, theater, string quartets and jazz ensembles evoke pretty much the same emotion as spinach, brussels sprouts, situps and a 7:30 a.m.

philosophy class. Hot tar and feathers seems a far more pleasant alternative.

So, the question remains, from where do these attitudes come and how can they be changed?

I say it's laziness. Or perhaps an unwillingness to give up a comfortable lifestyle. It's too easy to say, "Sure, let's go down to Aggieville again."

Now don't get me wrong, Aggieville is a wonderful place and I'm certain whatever the routine is, there's plenty of satisfaction gained from it. But come on, live a little. Be daring one night a week and turn the TV to PBS and leave it there (it's the channel that's skipped over as quickly as possible — even more quickly than The Weather Channel).

Or maybe something out of the ordinary can be found by looking at the Summer in the City posters hanging around town. And undoubtedly there will be an Arts in the Park poster next to it, announcing a summer filled with new experiences.

Sounds awful, I know. But therein may lie the heart of the problem. People today react and develop attitudes based upon only one sensory organ — their ears. Everyday someone will say, "I hear that movie is terrible," or "Sounds boring, I think I'll grab a beer instead." Today is the era of group attitudes and the only way to come by an individual attitude, it seems, is by keeping as open a mind as possible.

All this is not easy to do and I don't claim to be an expert myself. But it seems to me that too many people hate opera or think veal piccata is disgusting simply because others say so. I say try an aria here or there and take a bite of that mush whose name is nearly impossible to pronounce. It might be enjoyable. Then again, it might not, but at least it becomes a known fact, not just hearsay.

The hearsay factor makes mass marketing of products and ideas easy. Only opinion leaders — those who influence the attitude of others — need to be convinced the product or idea is good.

This theory works equally well in non-marketing arenas. In every facet of life there will be opinion leaders and opinion followers, but the leaders are those who have had enough varied experiences to gain the respect of others.

As for those kids and their parents, well, a pessimist would say most of the children won't remember what they heard that night. And while most of them are convinced the William Tell Overture is the Lone Ranger's song, I think it was still a beneficial evening.

Who knows, maybe five or 10 years from now a teen-ager will pick up a jazz album or even some Beethoven. He may buy it and he may not, but he will remember hearing a strange kind of music one night in a park. And you know what? It wasn't half bad.

Jazz fusion comes alive in 'dead' city

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reviewer

Jazz is alive and getting stronger in the near-dead, Manhattan music scene.

In Visible Images, a local jazz fusion band, played at Rocky Mountain Bonkers Sunday night. Unfortunately, only about 50 people came out to hear some of the most original music being made in this area.

Music Review

Jazz fusion is a relatively new musical venture. Mike Schulze, drummer for the band, described it as an oxymoron.

"Fusion is a combining of opposites. With jazz fusion, there may be a jazz structure, such as a (saxophone) solo, combined with a rock element, such as a rock drum beat and a thumping bass."

With a strong rhythm section of Mike Brown on bass and Schulze, most of the songs did highlight the sometimes mellow, sometimes screaming saxophone of Don Washington. A few songs also featured screeching guitar bits by Mike Irvine. Filling in the gaps and giving the band a richer sound was Rick Pontalio on keyboards.

In the three sets they played, In Visible Images performed a nice mix of jazz and jazz fusion songs. But most importantly, they performed them well. Whether it was a chaotic jazz fusion number or a "simple" jazz tune, they handled the songs as if they were old news.

The band wrote all but two of the songs they played. Thus, the show exemplified the inherent closeness between musicians and their music — something not often found in run-of-the-mill cover bands.

For a band that has only been together three months, they displayed a fine talent for creating tension in their music. Their songs were repetitive enough and long enough (each song averaged 12 minutes) to build the necessary tension, yet they steered clear of redundancy.

Furthermore, the musicians helped stretch the tension to its limits. Just when it seemed the music was as tense as possible, they would make it tighter. Then they would quickly release all tension and begin to build again.

Though building tension is no secret, In Visible Images seems to understand the need for it.

At first the music was a bit too loose, and the band seemed tight and uncomfortable. This was due in part to the sparse audience. But rather than let the crowd set the mood, the band took over.

After the first song, Brown said a very professional hello to the audience and received a dismal response. He then shed the professionalism and opted for a more personal approach. This proved to be just the thing to put everyone at ease. As the evening went on, the band and the audience became looser and the music got much tighter.

"Mike is a pretty straightforward guy," Washington said, concerning Brown's reprieve with the small crowd. "We don't have any set plan for dealing with an audience. We just go out there and see how it feels."

Despite a few technical problems and lengthy pauses between songs, the show was a good example of musicians playing music they enjoy. What problems the band had can easily be solved with more public appearances.

The idea of public appearance raises the question of whether or not there is a jazz or jazz fusion audience in Manhattan. Washington is hopeful, but at the same time, realistically critical.

"I think there is a jazz audience out there," he said. "But it is going to take some promotion to find it. I'm not trying to put this place (Bonkers) down, but most people are used to coming here to hear dance music. It is going to take some publicity to get people to come here to hear jazz."

Whether or not there is a jazz audience here remains to be seen. But In Visible Images is not relying on this city alone. They are trying to get shows in Lawrence and Kansas City.

"We sent a tape to Kansas City," Pontalio said, "because we know there is a jazz market there. Basically though, we are just playing it by ear."

In Visible Images played at the Smokey Hill River Festival in Salina, and will play in Junction City July 3. Their next scheduled Manhattan appearance is July 24 in Triangle Park.

De Niro, Connery score at box office

By ANDRE KELLY
Collegian Reviewer

To borrow a phrase from Birdseye, movie-going audiences "prepare yourselves." After years of advance hype and slowed production, "The Untouchables" is well worth the wait.

Film Review

Set in the 1930s, Kevin Costner (Silverado) is Elliot Ness, the unseasoned, but vigilant government official who is assigned to bring in Chicago crime-lord Al "Scarface" Capone (Robert De Niro).

Set against the backdrop of Prohibition, Ness is essentially doing a job that no one supports. His arrival in the Windy City is far from idealistic. The press heckles him, public officials offer bribes and because of extortion and payoffs, few in the police department are serious about jailing Capone.

It's not until a bogus-bust, which sets up Ness to look like a fool in the eyes of the press, that he meets a stern, street-wise Irishman named Malone (Sean Connery). Though just a beat-cop, Malone, reluctance aside, is the first of Ness' band of hand-picked enforcers.

Along the way, they're assigned a nerdy IRS agent Oscar Wallace, and to even the odds against Capone's sharpshooters they recruit a rookie, Italian gunslinger named Stone (Andy Garcia).

Even with its guns-and-gangster theme and loads of graphic violence, believe it or not, the main strength of the film is its cast of characters and their relationships to one another.

Costner is almost swallowed amid the vigorous performances of his co-stars. Even as James Bond, Connery is no pushover and De Niro is fascinating with his portrayal of Capone as an emotional chameleon.

As Malone, Connery is a raw, fiery-tempered soothsayer of very damaging street-gossip about Capone's liquor shipments. He only joined the group with the agreement that Ness play by Capone's rules: "If he sends one of yours to the hospital, send one of his to the morgue."

Then there's Capone. As the self-proclaimed "mayor of Chicago" he commands respect and fear with the press and public officials. It's believed he was the first gangster to ever give press conferences. Unlike other screen incarnations, this mobster is mercurial with his moods and volcanic in his outburst. With De Niro's treatment, one is made to believe his lies, his affability and charm, though never letting you forget the savagery that made him what he is.

As with most of De Palma's films, the photography is innovative as well as dynamic. One could argue a case for filming the movie in black and white, but that's been done before and it would have completely altered De Palma's panoramic feel to the era and the people who lived it. Unlike its flat, unrealistic television counterpart, De Palma's use of color, with its sharp, textured nuances breathes life into the tale and will draw even the uninitiated easily into the film.

Gangster movies have never been like this. Though not recommended for the squeamish, the violence and language are all in proper context, and you'll leave the film feeling as if it jumped right at you.

'Opry' presents toe-tappin' fun evening

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Head north on Tuttle Creek Boulevard, pass the Blue Hills Shopping Center on the left, then turn right on Marlatt Avenue.

The paved road quickly turns into gravel and a peach-colored building will appear on the left with a sign on the front reading "Manhattan Grand Ole Opry."

Anyone looking for a family-oriented, toe-tapping good time has come to the right place, said co-owner Bobby Pugh Jr. Eventually, the former body shop will be converted into a red barn, although the Opry has been in operation since March 20.

Inside the building, 300 metal seats face a raised stage, with speakers on either side of the platform, a band setup in the middle and a row of stage lights hanging from the ceiling. In the back of the room is a homemade concession stand with a red-checkered cloth. The wall nearby has rows of pictures showing various performers on stage. Oddly disorienting is the garage door on one wall which betrays the building's original purpose.

Pugh Jr. said he, Bobby Pugh Sr. and Paula French are actually the owners of the Opry. The younger Pugh acts as master of ceremonies, stage manager, booking agent and backup singer/musician. Pugh Sr. is the maintenance man, and French takes care of advertising and book-keeping, although she will sing in an emergency.

"I have been in music for 22 years," Pugh Jr. said. "I worked roads and clubs, but I was really tired of the traveling hassle."

"I wanted to start my own place, possibly modeled after the Grand Ole Oprys in Nashville, Branson (Mo.) and Roca (Neb.): country western music, a little gospel, and some jokes thrown in. All three of us love that type of show!"

French was taking classes at K-State, and Pugh Jr. happened to be playing at a gig in town with the Diamond T band. He went fishing and decided Manhattan had good fishing holes. In fact, it was a good town to settle in, he said.

After planning for two or three weeks, the trio opened the Manhattan Grand Ole Opry.

"Our main philosophy is that the Opry be a family atmosphere...no alcohol is permitted. Nobody wants to perform for drunks; these fans come to listen. Except for the Arts in the Park and some of the campus activities, there really aren't many places like this anymore," Pugh Jr. said.

Performers are expected to wear traditional outfits: jeans, a nice dress shirt and maybe a hat.

"Biker jackets, torn or faded clothes, shorts or sunglasses are inappropriate, and all of the men remove their hats for the gospel songs," Pugh Jr. said.

The Opry uses only local talent. Its primary goal is to give people who have never been on stage a chance to perform, he said. Sometimes it provides bands with the opportunity to pick up new members, too, but mostly it acts as a confidence booster.

Many students from campus come to perform, and age makes no difference in talent, either, said Pugh Jr., adding that he saw a 6-year-old fiddler during his travels who was as good as any adult. The Opry has introduced a "terrific" 15-year-old drummer, and the oldest performer so far has been 68.

Pugh Jr. said almost all performers are afraid their first time on stage. One of their biggest fears is forgetting the words to songs, but they are encouraged to have music stands in front of them.

"I always tell them to just make up lines as they go along if that happens," he said. "As long as the words rhyme, who's going to know? I do it all the time!"

Pugh Jr. often gives advice to new performers based on his own experience. He tells them not to be nervous because the back-up people are there to help them, not hurt them.

"We'll do anything for them," he said. "Sure, we've had some acts flop, but it's not hard for the backup to cover their mistakes. We just harmonize if something sounds bad."

The Opry has developed a strong following of fans. Visitors come from towns such as Salina, Wamego and Kansas City. Sometimes, there are more out-of-towners than locals, Pugh Jr. said.

Part of the attraction is the atmosphere. Because the building is small, the performers are closer to the audience, he said. The first half of the show is set songs, but the second half is generally audience requests.

"Oh, the crowd sometimes dances in the aisles during the performance, and that's perfectly OK," Pugh Jr. said. "They clap and whistle and stomp, and really get involved in the music."

Pugh Jr. said he wanted to go to Nashville, Tenn., and become a star. "That may still happen," he said. "For right now, I want to help others realize their dreams."

Critters from the Creek

How long has it been since you moseyed down to the creek and caught something for dinner besides fish? How about chowing on a hot bowl of turtle soup, a set of crispy frog legs or a steaming plate of crawdads?

For many of us: NEVER! But, if prepared in the right way, many freshwater reptiles, amphibians and crustaceans can be quite palatable.

Many people recall Grandpa spending a day fishing and coming home empty-handed except for a large, hostile snapping turtle in the back of his pickup truck. What usually happened to this animal? Either Grandpa gave it a toss, or Grandma whipped up a big pot of turtle soup.

This illustrates the first problem with turtle soup: finding a turtle. Usually the only time the dish is made is when a turtle is accidentally caught on a fishing trip. Because snapping turtles are the best-tasting turtle, this also limits the possibilities of finding the meat for the soup.

But be careful. The size of the turtle is deceiving. Since about 50 percent of the animal consists of its shell, this presents the special dish's second problem: shelling and cleaning the animal.

Turtle soup is simply a vegetable soup with turtle meat added. When turtle meat is combined with carrots, turnips, celery, onions, herbs and possibly some sliced beef or veal, a popular rural dish is created.

Larry Costlow, Manhattan, said turtle meat tastes a lot like chicken. But unlike chicken, he said, snapping turtle has seven different types of meat, not just white and dark.

Everyone's favorite amphibian, the frog, has had its legs on dinner tables around the world for years. These critters have gained popularity due to their delicate flesh.

This dish is a bit more available to its hungry preparer. Instead of sneaking out into the wee hours of the morning with a gunny sack and a flashlight, frog legs are now available in many frozen food aisles of grocery stores. Unfortunately, because of their size, it can take a large quantity of legs to fill up a person. The satisfactory quantity can range from six to eight pairs of small legs or three to four pairs of large legs, the best size for frying.

Frog legs can be prepared many different ways, but the most popular method is deep-fat fried. (Probably because the coating hides the shape of those "hopless" little legs lying on the plate).

After thoroughly washing the legs, dip them first in flour, then beaten egg, and finally, bread crumbs. Deep fry for two to three minutes and serve with cocktail or tartar sauce. Another popular method is dipping the legs in beer batter.

Frog legs can also be sauteed in butter, but they must be carefully monitored to avoid their sticking to the pan. The meat is delicate and can tear easily.

The crawdad, or crawfish as people from the Louisiana Bayou call them, is another tasty critter from the creek not many people have tried here in Kansas. The crustacean is popular in Louisiana but has not gained the recognition it should in the Midwest.

To capture these little morsels, the hunter and his partner must be prepared to walk in knee-deep muddy water for several yards with a seine.

The preparer of the dish must take time to clean and soak the crawdads for several hours before boiling them. Most of the animal's meat is in the tail, although there is a tasty little piece of fat in the head that can be sucked out.

The most popular method of preparing crawfish is to boil them with carrots, onions, shallots, spices and a dash of white wine.

Remember, these goodies aren't for the prim and proper. Take them by the hand and eat them one after the other. Crawfish creates a thirst and after satisfying that thirst, a craving for another crawdad comes along. It's a vicious, delicious circle.

Students to learn about crime clues

Super sleuth students at K-State can learn how to better find clues at the scene of a crime with the help of Clifton Meloan, professor of chemistry. Meloan offers a class that teaches students to use physics, chemistry and geology to help investigate evidence.

The class involves the study of non-medical evidence at the scene of a crime. Students cover subjects ranging from fiber research to lipstick analysis to fingerprints.

Meloan, an analytical chemist, recently helped improve a technique allowing fingerprints to be lifted from a victim's skin more than two hours after a crime.

Two plant clubs announce awards

Two students in the Department of Horticulture have received more than $5,000 in scholarships this spring.

Margaret Sawatzky, senior in horticulture with an emphasis in fruit and vegetable production, was the winner of a $3,500 National Council of State Garden Clubs scholarship. Sawatzky was nominated by the Kansas Associated Garden Clubs.

Amy E. Newton, senior in hortical therapy and gerontology, received the $2,000 Katherine M. Grossup Scholarship from the Garden Club of America.

K-State is the only school offering bachelor's and master's degrees in horticultural therapy.

Professors receive teaching awards

Seven professors recognized for outstanding teaching shared $6,500 in awards this spring.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, and Michael Suleiman, professor and former head of the Department of Political Science, both received the $1,000 Distinguished Graduate Faculty Award.

The $500 Norden Distinguished Teacher Award was bestowed upon Dr. Richard M. DeBowes Jr., assistant professor of surgery and medicine. DeBowes was recognized for outstanding teaching and professional activities.

The four winners of the $1,000 AMOCO Foundation Distinguished Undergraduate Teaching Award were Jeffery R. Williams, associate professor of agricultural economics; Sue M. Zschoche, assistant professor of history; Ann G. Jankovich, instructor of adult and occupational education; and Martha B. Stone, associate professor of foods and nutrition.

Chernobyl clean-up effort continues

By The Associated Press

KIEV, U.S.S.R. — The explosion at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant left at least 27 nearby cities and villages too contaminated for people to live in for the foreseeable future, a government official said Wednesday.

Soviet officials have halted decontamination work in these areas, said Konstantin T. Fursov, deputy chairman of the Kiev regional government committee in the Ukraine.

Fursov told a group of Moscow-based reporters that the areas include the city of Prip'yat, which was home to more than 50,000 people before the April 26, 1986, disaster.

Prip'yat is only two miles from the nuclear power station, where an explosion and fire tore apart the

No. 4 reactor, spewed radioactivity that killed 31 people and eventually spread around the world.

Regional officials contend most of the 69 cities and villages evacuated will eventually be resettled, but said they could not predict when the process will be complete. All the towns were in an 18-mile danger zone around the plant.

"There are 27 populated points that will not be resettled in the foreseeable future," Fursov said. The others will be repopulated gradually, he said.

Fursov said two towns in the 18-mile danger zone, Cheremoshnya and Nevitskoye, had returned to normal with fully operating schools, stores and public transportation.

Some residents have returned to another 16 towns that have been decontaminated but still lack many public services, he said.

"People are returning there without permission, mostly elderly people," Fursov said during a meeting with reporters at the regional government headquarters in Kiev.

"Conditions there are safe, but the social services are not ready yet. These people are coming back of their own volition. It's their home."

The reporters, on a trip organized by the Soviet Foreign Ministry, also visited the new village of Tavriya, built last year to house 205 families evacuated from the "Path of Communism" collective farm 17 miles from the accident site.

Many of the evacuees told reporters they were satisfied with their new home but would prefer to live in the towns and villages where they grew up and raised their children.

Officials have said 135,000 people were evacuated from the northern Ukraine and southern Byelorussia after the Chernobyl accident. Fursov said 91,000 of them were from his Kiev region.

Another deputy chief of the regional government, Anatoly Duda, said the two towns that have been completely resettled account for only about 500 of the evacuees.

Fursov said 52 new towns like Tavriya have been built in the Kiev region, but he did not say how many evacuees have been housed there or how many of the settlements are temporary.

Two of Chernobyl's four nuclear reactors have been brought back on line since the accident.

Bakkers to fight Falwell for parsonage

By The Associated Press

TEGA CAY, S.C. — A tearful Tammy Faye Bakker said Wednesday she and her husband will fight to keep their $1.3 million parsonage, complaining they've been "hunted like a scared animal" since the Rev. Jerry Falwell took over the PTL ministry.

Tammy Bakker said her husband, Jim, would never have permitted the 518,000-member ministry to end up in bankruptcy court, a move taken Friday by PTL's new management.

"He just never would have done that. And we're so sad it happened," she told reporters while standing in the driveway of the parsonage that PTL's new officers have asked the Bakkers to leave.

The ministry, under Falwell's leadership since a sex scandal led to Bakker's downfall March 19, filed for protection from creditors under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code. Falwell says the ministry is $70 million in debt, and owes 1,400 creditors, many of them broadcasters who carry PTL programs.

The Bakkers returned to the parsonage a week ago from their home in Palm Springs, Calif., where they had been in seclusion since March. She said the Bakkers will fight to keep the parsonage, which she claims PTL gave them.

Falwell spokesman Mark DeMoss said most documents relating to the parsonage "have not proven to be terribly official."

Representatives of the Bakkers were to have discussed the house-ownership dispute Tuesday night with PTL officials, but the representatives canceled the meeting at the last minute, DeMoss said.

DeMoss said PTL leaders want the Bakkers to leave the Tega Cay home, but the ministry had nothing to do with movers showing up there Wednesday.

A moving van from Charlotte, N.C., pulled up to the parsonage, but the two movers were at the house only minutes before they left.

City may stop funds for tutoring

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan City Commission will decide Monday whether or not to stop funding the Friendship Tutoring Program. If the city drops the program, it would lose $6,132 — the majority of its budget.

The 21-year-old social and education program, designed to assist area youth, needs financial support if it is to remain active in the 1987-88 school year.

On May 26, the commission informed directors funding would probably be eliminated next year. Commissioner Richard Hayter said this is not due to a lack of trust in FTP.

"I don't think there is a single commissioner who doesn't think it's a worthwhile program," he said.

The commission's belief is that FTP is an educational program and should be supported by the school district, not the city, Hayter said. By ceasing to fund it, the city will be able to increase support for other social service programs.

Furthermore, the commission is not in favor of partial funding for FTP.

"At this point," Hayter said, "the commission feels strongly that it is an educational program that should be supported by the school district."

Commissioners want the program to continue, Hayter said, so they will be visiting with school board members to encourage them to fund FTP.

U.S.D. 383 Superintendent Hal Rowe said it is possible that the school district could pay for the program "if the school board feels that it's appropriate."

Rowe also agrees that FTP is a beneficial program and has helped children in the community.

FTP has received limited financial support from K-State's Department of Human Development and Family Studies, but the majority has always come from the city. For the 1986-87 school year, the city budgeted $6,132, said Pat McClellan, city accounting supervisor.

The intergovernmental meeting will be at noon June 22, at The Cotton Club. The meeting is open to the public.

Manager retires from duties after 10 years of city service

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

As more than 10 years of service for Manhattan City Manager Don Harmon come to an end, the major project of his tenure, the downtown redevelopment, also nears completion.

Harmon, who retires this month, said the prospect of redevelopment for the core of the city was the major factor that brought him to Manhattan.

"The city commission was ready to do downtown," Harmon said. "They didn't want a suburban mall."

Although the downtown project has been ongoing for nine years, Harmon said he has not been discouraged.

"I was involved in a similar project in Iowa that took 10 years," he said.

Prior to his position in Manhattan, Harmon served in city administrations in Boulder, Colo., during the 1950s; Joplin, Mo., during the 1960s; and Council Bluffs, Iowa, during the 1970s.

But Harmon said that his post at Manhattan has been the best during his 37 years in city management.

"The high caliber of people, partially influenced by the University community, and the forward-thinking people of Manhattan, as well as the size and attitudes of the community made my job easier and satisfying," he said.

The relationship of the city to K-State is paramount according to Harmon.

"K-State and Manhattan cannot work unilaterally; it must be a bilateral relationship," he said.

Harmon cited the fire station north of campus at Kimball and Denison avenues as an example of this relationship. The fire station is located on land leased from the University, and K-State students train and work there. It required much cooperation between the city and K-State as well as government sources to get the station built, he said.

Fort Riley is also an important part of Manhattan's total outlook, Harmon said.

"Many military personnel live in Manhattan and the payroll of the post is $260 (million) to $270 million," he said.

Harmon, who announced his retirement in February, will be replaced by Michael A. Conduff, 32, city manager in Pittsburg.

Conduff, who will take over in late July, was selected from a field of 97 people from 27 states. Jim Pearson, assistant city manager and one of four finalists for the job, will serve during the interim period from June 24 to July 20.

Conduff has a bachelor's degree in civil engineering from the University of New Hampshire-Durham, and a master's degree in business administration from Pittsburg State University. He has worked for the city of Pittsburg since 1977 when he began as an engineering aide. He became city engineer in 1981 and city manager in 1982.

Inquiry continues in possession case

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — There is insufficient evidence to prosecute Mayor Andrew Young or other city officials for obstruction of justice in the handling of drug allegations against civil rights activist Julian Bond, a federal prosecutor said Wednesday.

But U.S. Attorney Robert Barr said his office is continuing to investigate allegations of possession and distribution of illegal drugs by a number of prominent Atlantans.

He declined to identify the targets of the drug investigation, which began after Alice Bond went to police March 19 and reported that her husband used cocaine regularly.

Bond, a former state senator and current president of the NAACP in Atlanta, has denied drug use and has not been charged with any crime although Mrs. Bond, in a tape recording of a police interview, said drug dealers fed cocaine to her husband "like milk to a baby."

Barr would not speculate on when his office would wrap up its investigation or whether a federal grand jury would hear more evidence.

Young, flanked by top city officials and supporters, said at a City Hall news conference later that his faith in the judicial system has been affirmed.

"I was really pleased that after a complete and thorough investigation, the U.S. attorney found there was nothing we could be indicted for," Young said. "The thing that hurt me the most (about the investigation) was to be associated with drug use."

The grand jury was asked to consider whether Young, who was ambassador to the United Nations in the Carter administration, tampered with a federal witness by telephoning Mrs. Bond on March 25 before an interview she had with police and FBI agents.

Young acknowledged that he made the call, but said he called her out of concern as a family friend and the call was not intended to discourage her testimony.

"I said if she really had evidence, fine, but if she was just telling, passing rumors...she shouldn't do anything in a fit of emotion," Young told reporters.

Mrs. Bond later told police she would no longer provide them with information and called the Atlanta newspapers to recant her previous statements.

Road set for fixing

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan City Commission approved by a 3-2 vote the resolution authorizing construction of improvements on Browning Avenue between Dickens and Kimball avenues.

Funds would go toward repaving the street and constructing curbs and gutters.

Discussion at Tuesday night's meeting centered around the decided 70/30 split of funds, with 70 percent of the improvement expenses paid by the city. The residents living along Browning Avenue would be responsible for the remaining 30 percent.

This is a 10 percent decrease for the residents, whose interests were represented by Commissioner Dave Fiser. He had talked with several Browning Avenue residents as well as some townspeople not residing on Browning.

Fiser said the people to whom he talked seemed to agree that an 80/20 split would be fair, instead of the originally proposed 60/40 split.

Royals win 10-5, halt losing skid

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals, taking the field just five hours after former Manager Dick Howser died of brain cancer, beat the Oakland Athletics 10-5 Wednesday night behind the pitching of Bret Saberhagen.

A minute of silence in memory of Howser was observed by the crowd of 26,780 at Royals Stadium prior to the game. Howser, who began spring training as Kansas City's manager, died Wednesday afternoon after a year-long fight with cancer. The Royals will wear armbands in tribute to Howser starting July 3, the day the team had previously planned to retire his uniform No. 10.

Saberhagen became the first 12-game winner in the major leagues and George Brett, Bo Jackson and Frank White hit home runs as the Royals ended a four-game losing streak.

Saberhagen, 12-1, gave up seven hits in his eighth complete game. He struck out seven and walked two.

Brett, who had three hits and scored three runs, hit his second homer of the season deep into the Royals' right-field bullpen with one out in the fifth for a 6-5 lead. Jackson led off the sixth with his 14th home run, knocking out Dave Stewart, 7-7.

The Royals added another run in the sixth when Steve Balboni doubled off Dennis Lamp and scored on Hal McRae's pinch-single against reliever Dave Leiper. Danny Tartabull and White hit sacrifice flies in the seventh.

Mike Davis lifted Oakland into a 5-5 tie with his 17th home run, a two-run shot, in the fifth.

White's three-run home run, his sixth, capped a five-run rally in the Kansas City third.

Jamie Quirk led off with a single and scored on Kevin Seitzer's one-out double. Brett singled home Seitzer and Tartabull followed with a single ahead of White's home run to left.

Kevin Vondemkamp, senior in animal science and industry, stretches for a softball Wednesday evening at L.P. Washburn Recreation Area intramural fields during the opening day of intramural softball.

Vondemkamp's team, Bored Stiff, won the contest, 18-4, against the Ep Heads.

Intramural softball games underway at fields

By The Collegian Staff

The crack of bats could be heard at the L.P. Washburn Recreation Area intramural fields as the summer intramural softball season got underway Tuesday. The softball leagues will run until the end of summer school.

There are three softball leagues for students this summer, said Steve Martini, assistant director of recreational services and intramural coordinator.

"We have one men's league consisting of nine teams and 18 co-rec teams making up two leagues," he said.

Martini said Mondays and Wednesdays will be known as men's night, with games being held in the evening at 5:30 and 6:30.

The league is using a round-robin format, which requires all teams to play each other. The team with the best record at the season's end is the champion.

Co-rec softball play will be at 5:30 and 6:30 p.m. Tuesdays and Thursdays.

Rules for the co-rec leagues are slightly different from normal regulation rules of softball. In the men's league, as well as the co-rec leagues, 10 players per team can be on the field at one time.

Although the men's league requires an umpire to officiate, no umpire officiates the co-rec leagues' games.

One of the rules involved in co-rec softball is the two-pitch rule. Each team has a designated pitcher who pitches to his own team members. If the batter does not hit the ball in play in those two pitches, the batter is called out.

The pitcher is also required to call plays at the bases either safe or out, while the catcher is responsible for calling balls hit fair or foul.

"If a team feels the other team is not making fair calls, they can request that team to assign a different pitcher," Martini said.

After the co-rec season is completed, which also uses a round-robin format, the two top teams from each league will play for the championship.

"We hope to get a schedule out soon for everyone to see, so the leagues can get some support this summer," Martini said.

Manager dies from cancer

Former Kansas City Royals manager Dick Howser, who led the Royals to an '85 World Series championship, died Wednesday afternoon.

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Former Kansas City Royals manager Dick Howser, who helped bring championship baseball to New York and Kansas City but won even greater acclaim for his courageous stand against brain cancer, died Wednesday afternoon.

Howser, 51, was admitted to St. Luke's Hospital for the last time June 4. Death came at 2:45 p.m., about 11 months after doctors partially removed a malignant tumor from the left side of his brain on July 22. Just one week before, although suffering persistent headaches and frequent lapses in memory, Howser managed the American League to victory in the All-Star Game.

Doctors were unable to remove the entire tumor and twice in the ensuing months employed experimental procedures where cancer-killing cells were injected into the area.

When Howser's condition became known last July, extra secretaries had to be hired to handle a torrent of cards and letters from every continent in the world. At last count, the family had received, and answered, more than 14,000 messages, a spokesman for the Kansas City Royals said.

After 10 years as a coach for the New York Yankees, Howser became manager in 1980 and guided the team to 103 victories and the American League East title. Becoming manager of the Royals in 1981, he took them to AL West titles in 1984 and 1985 and to the '85 World Series championship. He never managed a team that finished worse than second.

Although the three operations had obviously weakened him, Howser vowed to return this season as manager of the Royals. He greeted the players when they opened spring camp in February but resigned just three days later, admitting he had over-estimated his stamina.

"It just wouldn't be fair to the team," he said at the time.

Howser made his last public appearance April 6 when the Royals opened their home season.

Royals' slugger on comeback trail

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jim Eisenreich, who left the major leagues three years ago because of a nervous disorder, returned Wednesday in a Kansas City Royals uniform.

Eisenreich was called up from the Royals' Class AA farm team in Memphis, where he led the Southern League in batting average, doubles, triples and runs scored.

Royals Manager Billy Gardner said he plans to use the left-handed Eisenreich as a pinch hitter at first. Eisenreich is just glad to be back in a big-league uniform.

"I feel I can play better than I ever have," Eisenreich said.

In 1982, Eisenreich, now 28, was a promising rookie with the Minnesota Twins, hitting .310 in his first 29 games. He left the Twins in 1984 after being benched for uncontrollable shaking.

The Twins deemed his condition stage fright, and Eisenreich went home to St. Cloud, Minn., still hoping to make it back to the majors. Last year, the Royals bought his contract for $1.

Eisenreich has since found out the disorder that nearly ended his career was not psychological.

A specialist diagnosed him as having Tourette's Syndrome, a neurological disorder. It is characterized by facial tics and twiches of the arms and shoulders, and in extreme cases sufferers can emit involuntary grunts and barking noises or shout out swear words. The disorder can be treated with drugs.

Eisenreich has had the disorder since childhood.

"Even when I was in little league, the other team used to bang on the fence in the dugout and yell at me," Eisenreich said earlier this season.

Eisenreich replaces 15-year veteran Jorge Orta, who batted .180 in 21 games this season. In 70 games with Memphis this season, Eisenreich had a .382 average in 275 at-bats and hit 36 doubles and 10 triples. He also had 11 home runs and 57 RBI.

National race to pass through city

By BILL LANG
Staff Writer

On either June 24 or 25, 45 people will be taking a bicycle ride through Manhattan as part of a nationwide race.

The sixth annual McDonald's Race Across America will begin Saturday at Crissy Field in Presidio, Calif., and end eight to 12 days later at the Washington Monument in Washington, D.C.

Forty-five of the world's strongest men and women endurance cyclists will attempt to ride the entire 3,117 miles almost non-stop, sleeping only 90 minutes to two hours per day.

The McDonald's Race Across America entourage consists of more than 100 vehicles and 300 support people. They will pass many of the McDonald's in America, many of which have been designated as some of the 81 time stations and media centers located every 30-50 miles on the actual route.

John Marino, race director and founder of the event, said the race is not attempting to raise any donations.

"It just started out as something to prove to myself," Marino said in a telephone interview, referring to when he first did it seven years ago. "It's now a challenge to almost any serious bicyclist in the world."

"This event is tougher than the La Tour de France (a race around the border of France) in that those cyclists get to sleep and rest for longer periods of time," Marino said.

The cyclists' first-time station in Kansas will be located in St. Francis at the Apco Gas Station on the south side of U.S. Highway 36. They will continue along Route 36 until they reach Downs, when they turn onto U.S. Highway 24 and wind their way down through Beloit, Clay Center and into Manhattan at the McDonald's Restaurant, 815 N. Third St. The time of their arrival is uncertain. The cyclists will continue east past Manhattan.

The public is encouraged to come out and cheer on the cyclists as they pass through. To determine the time of arrival in Manhattan, people may call 1-900-410-RAMM for an update of the cyclists' progress and location.

'88 Games in S. Korea despite riot

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Only war could force the International Olympic Committee to remove next year's Summer Games from Seoul, the IOC said Wednesday.

Recent political demonstrations in South Korea, some of them involving violent clashes with police, have done nothing to change the IOC's plans to stage the Games in the capital city next year, Michele Verdier, the IOC spokeswoman, said.

"The position is quite clear. The Games have been awarded to Seoul and there is absolutely no change in our position," Verdier said in a telephone interview from the IOC's headquarters in Lausanne, Switzerland.

The Olympic Charter, the IOC's bylaws, provides for changing the site of the Games only in the case of "an act of war," she said.

Asked if that would mean a civil war as well as war against an outside force, the spokeswoman replied: "That could be an explanation for the IOC and that could be a reason for the IOC to move."

Mossman's recruiting efforts a success as Lady Cats solidify frontcourt talent

By BILL LANG
Staff Writer

While Lon Kruger's recruiting season is going just as well as his first season, Matilda Mossman's off-season recruiting coups may have been just as successful.

Mossman, head coach of the Lady Cats, has so far landed the recruits needed to bolster the attack which finished 22-8 and tied for first place (with Missouri and Kansas) in the Big Eight Conference last season.

This year's class is one of the tallest ones in recent years, but it is the overall talent of each player that has made Mossman feel good about her recruiting efforts.

"We're very pleased with this year's recruiting," Mossman said. "We landed six very talented girls who can play and will challenge for a starting spot."

"They all have played basketball for a long time, and all have a lot of talent," she added.

Of the incoming freshmen, Diana Miller from Buhler figures to make the most impact, according to Mossman.

"She's a very physical player and is not afraid to go inside with the ball," Mossman said. "She is a good ball handler and strong rebounder, and if I had to summarize her effort on the court in one word, it would be 'intensity'."

As mentioned, this year's class is a tall one. The shortest player is Nadira Hazim of Topeka at 5-8, but after her the lineup reads: Kristie Bahner, 5-11 center, from Topeka; Miller a 5-11 guard or small forward;

Tonya King, 6-0 forward, from Liberal; Stacey Boyle, 6-2 center, from Dodge City; and Jennifer Grabing, 6-2 center, from Frohna, Mo.

Last year, King averaged 21 points and 15 rebounds per game for Liberal High School and was tabbed an all-league selection.

Boyle, from Dodge City Community Junior College, earned Kodak All-American honors plus all-region honors, while leading the Conquistadors to 22-7 record averaging 27 points and 11 rebounds per game.

Miller, who last season earned all-state honors and was named a Converse All-American, averaged 23 points and 10 rebounds per contest for Buhler High School.

Bahner, an all-state selection her senior year and all-league the last three years, averaged 18 points and 10 rebounds per contest for Topeka High School last season.

Grabing, the only out-of-state recruit, from Frohna, Mo., finished third-place on all-time scoring list for Perryville High School with 1,600 points. In her last season she earned all-state honors by averaging 19 points and 10 rebounds per game.

Hazim, from Topeka West High School, was tabbed a National Youth Foundation All-American her senior year and all-state, all-league and all-city performer for the Chargers. Hazim also broke the single game scoring mark in the state playoffs with 42 points. The previous record was established by Lynette Woodard of Wichita Heights, who is now a member of the Harlem Globetrotters. Hazim left Topeka West as the all-time leading scorer.

Kansans must buckle-up or pay fines

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansans who don't buckle up for safety will be subject to $10 fines starting next month, something state officials hope may boost seat belt usage in Kansas to near 50 percent.

"It's a highly publicized law and there's no reason people shouldn't be aware of it," said Lt. Bill Jacobs, a Kansas Highway Patrol spokesman, adding that troopers are ready to start issuing citations July 1.

Under terms of the 1986 seat belt law, warning tickets were to be issued for the first 12 months after it went on the books. From the time the law went into effect last July until the end of April, Jacobs said, troopers had issued 39,365 seat belt warning tickets.

"That's as long of a warning period as we've had on anything," Jacobs said.

Sherry Blair, a spokeswoman for the Safety Belt Education Office at Kansas State University, said she believes the fines will roughly double seat belt usage from the estimated 25.5 percent of Kansas motorists who strapped themselves down this spring.

"When you have to reach into your wallet, it reminds you that there's something that you need to be doing," Blair said. "Let me emphasize that the law is only the second best reason to buckle up."

By far the best reason, Blair said, is that people can save their own lives by developing a habit of seat belt use. She said the new law already has lowered the number of traffic deaths in the state, from 284 during the last six months of 1985 to 260 during the last half of 1986.

As seat belt usage increases, the benefits will be even more dramatic, Blair said. With 80 percent compliance, estimates indicate as many as 85 fewer people would die each year in Kansas traffic accidents and there would be 3,100 fewer injuries for a savings of about $55 million in public funds, she said.

"We're looking at the biggest life-saving law on the books," Blair said.

State transportation surveys showed only 9.9 percent of motorists statewide were using seat belts before the law went into effect last year, Blair said.

By last fall, when seat belt usage was measured for the first time after the law went on the books, she said, 23.6 percent were using their safety belts.

"We've seen a slight increase even since then, which frankly is pleasing to us because we hadn't expected to see an big increase until this July when the fines go into effect," Blair said.

The Safety Belt Education Office, a division of Kansas State University's Cooperative Extension Service, is planning a special publicity campaign to urge people to buckle up before the fines go into effect, she said.

In addition, dramatic public service announcements depicting the usefulness of seat belts in an accident situation have been sent to Kansas television stations, Blair said. The goal of the three full time and six part time employees working for the office is to achieve 100 percent seat belt usage in Kansas, she said.

Under the law, motorists can be fined $10 including court costs for failure to wear seat belts only when they are cited for another traffic violation.

The law requires seat belts to be worn by drivers and all front seat occupants of passenger cars. Attorney General Robert T. Stephan has issued a legal opinion that says front seat passengers who fail to buckle up would be responsible for paying their own fines.

The term "passenger car" is defined as any automobile designed for carrying 10 or fewer people, including vans.

Motorcycles and trailers are exempt from the seat belt requirements as are vehicles built on truck chassis, constructed with features for off-road use, registered with a gross weight of more than 16,000 pounds or built before federal regulations required them to be equipped with safety belts.

Certain people also are exempt. They include anyone who has a statement from a doctor that says seat belts cannot be worn for medical reasons, U.S. Postal Service employees delivering mail and newspaper carriers who are at work on their paper routes.

Decision is delayed on road programs

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Governor's Highway Task Force struggled in vain Wednesday to decide which projects to include in its tentative $1.8 billion road building program, bogging down in testy debate over whether southeast Kansas needs a four-lane highway from Wichita to Neodesha.

The inconclusive discussion finally was shut off when task force members who think a so-called Super Two-lane highway is adequate for southeast Kansas tried to force a vote on the issue.

Chairman Horace Edwards refused to allow the vote, saying he feared taking a clearcut stand now could polarize the task force members in their positions on other projects and make it impossible to reach eventual consensus on a total program.

However, state Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, a task force member, accused Edwards of stalling. He said he believes Edwards and Gov. Mike Hayden want to manipulate the task force into recommending their plan, regardless of the task force members' true feelings.

"There's a finely-tuned coalition here, and it's just about to fall apart," Morris told Edwards as the task force chairman delayed the vote on the southeast Kansas road.

Morris accused Edwards of escalating the cost of the program from a maximum $1.5 billion to $1.8 billion at a June 3-4 meeting of the task force, a charge Edwards denied.

The secretary said he was asked to submit options, that he offered 12 plans and when he said he preferred the $1.8 billion plan, the task force tentatively accepted it as a working model.

Both supporters and opponents of building a four-lane highway from Wichita to Neodesha claimed after the meeting they could have won the test, but agreed it would have been very close.

Edwards, who is secretary of the Department of Transportation, postponed the decision-making until the task force's next meeting, July 1-2. He said he hopes the task force can reach consensus at that meeting on projects to recommend and a funding package for the program.

The 19-member panel must set priorities on projects it will include in its recommendations to Gov. Mike Hayden, which are expected by late next month.

Hayden, who established the task force last February, has said he wants a comprehensive program recommended to him — both projects to be built and ways to fund them — so he can take it to a special session of the Legislature, probably in late August.

Southwestern Bell receives $7.2 million refund

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission today tentatively approved a $7.2 million refund for customers of Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. which stems from a 1986 U.S. Supreme Court ruling on the rates phone companies can charge for depreciation.

Bell, which serves 800,000 customers or about 80 percent of all telephone customers in the state, plans to use the refund to help pay for a $7.1 million reduction in fees charged for in-state, long-distance calls, which also was approved today by the three-member commission.

Similar reductions were also approved for 36 other local phone companies which want to cut their long-distance rates, bringing the total fee reduction to $8.7 million.

The commission also decided to allow Kansas' three largest local service telephone companies to offer customers in 10 communities calling into nearby metropolitan areas plans for reducing their long distance rates.

The refund due to overcharges for depreciation will help pay for Bell's proposed reduction in rates for long-distance calls made within each of the three service areas in Kansas — basically the 913 and 316 area codes and the Kansas City metropolitan area.

Originally, Bell wanted to increase basic monthly service rates 60 cents for its customers to generate $6.5 million to pay for the long-distance rate cuts. However, the commission rejected that idea.

An alternative plan was developed which calls for Bell to double the price it charges for 15 luxury services to help cover the cost of lower long-distance "access charges."

For example, the cost of installing "custom calling" services such as call-forwarding and call-waiting will jump from $7.50 to $15 for residential customers. Installation of touch-tone will climb from $11.25 to $20.75 for residential customers.

How individual customers will fare under the changes will depend on how much they use their phones. Customers who don't make long-distance calls within Kansas but who sign up for discretionary services will see their bills climb. Those who frequently make long-distance calls to points within Kansas will likely see their rates drop.

Growing competition in the long-distance market is putting pressure on the corporation commission to allow regulated utilities like Bell and

AT&T Communications to lower their rates and compete with unregulated long-distance companies such as MCI and Sprint.

By Bell lowering its access fees, AT&T, MCI and Sprint all will experience savings in their costs of handling long distance calls between service and out-of-state areas. AT&T plans to pass on the reduction by cutting its rates $1.3 million, or 2 percent.

The $7.2 million refund relates to a May 27, 1986, Supreme Court decision which held the Federal Communications Commission may not force states to use depreciation formulas the FCC had prescribed for telephone equipment and facilities used for service inside each state.

As a result of the FCC formula, Bell overcharged Kansas customers about $32.3 million from April 1983 to June 30, 1986. The higher depreciation schedules remained in effect until the state commission settled on a new formula and Bell now is going to refund the additional overcharge.

Reciprocal

charged Missouri architecture students. Roughly 350 Missourians are enrolled in K-State's architecture programs. Krause estimates the state is losing $1.3 million annually by not charging out-of-state rates.

Stan Koplik, executive director of the Board of Regents, said this setup isn't advantageous to Kansas.

"It is insulting to have to pay $40,000 for the privilege of underwriting $1.5 million."

But Lapping said the money brought into the state by those 350 students is substantial. Assuming each student spends about $5,000 an academic year on tuition, housing and books, and other school expenses, the total equals $1.75 million. Lapping said that amount can be realistically multiplied 2.5 times to estimate the amount of funding generated in the community.

Koplik and Hammond said both states are interested in continuing reciprocity, but the current conditions are unacceptable to both sides. Krause said public policy is a problem.

"In Kansas, we consider it to be good public policy to send students to UMKC to study dentistry," Krause said. "We also consider it good public policy to accept Missouri students into Kansas architecture programs at in-state tuition. Missouri, on the other hand, considers it good public policy to sell seats in the dentistry school."

Krause said the Missouri Coordinating Board, the closest Missouri equivalent to the Kansas Board of Regents, doesn't see the need for Missouri students to attend Kansas schools to study architecture to be as great as the need for Kansas students to study dentistry in Missouri.

He said the issue of what will constitute an equitable agreement between the two states is the focal point of the negotiations.

Effects of the Loss

Lapping said the loss of reciprocity will not affect the quality of K-State's architecture programs, but that the Missouri students will suffer from the loss of an easily accessible quality program.

"We know on the Kansas side that the Missouri students have no choice," Lapping said.

There are currently two architecture programs in Missouri, but, Lapping said, neither is a viable option for Missouri students.

The program at Drury, a private school in Springfield, is unaccredited, which Lapping said is unacceptable in the field of architecture. Washington University in St. Louis, also a private school, has a better program, but is expensive and accepts a limited number of students.

There are possible alternatives to a new reciprocal agreement. Currently, Kansas has an agreement whereby its students can study optometry at the University of Missouri at St. Louis for the price of in-state Missouri tuition, because Kansas underwrites each student $5,000 each year.

To attend UMSL under the agreement, the students must agree to practice optometry in Kansas at the end of their education. If they choose to practice elsewhere, they are obligated to pay back to the state the $20,000 invested in four years of education, plus interest.

Hammond said a similar agreement could be arranged to allow Kansas students to obtain seats at UMKC's dental school for in-state tuition. She said 90 percent of the students who receive degrees in dental hygiene or surgery already return to Kansas to establish a practice, with no obligation to do so. Koplik said the price the state would have to pay for seats in the dental school is unknown, but has been estimated at $7,500 a year.

Nonetheless, attempts will be made to save the reciprocal agreement under more equitable terms for both parties. Krause said the difficulties now being experienced are a natural part of any negotiation process.

"The first round of negotiations are always interesting," Krause said. "This is a fiscal, political and educational process. I don't think reciprocity will be totally lost."

The agreement may be up for renegotiation, but the students attending school under the program in either state can rest easy.

Lapping said even if the attempt to renegotiate is unsuccessful and the program is terminated, students who have already begun their course work will be guaranteed completion of their degrees under the existing agreement. The agreement will also cover students enrolling in the fall.

While the main conflict is rotating around dental and architectural studies, Hammond said the other academic programs maintained under the agreement should remain intact.

The number of students enrolled in the other majors are, for the most part, equal in both states, so financial equity is being maintained, she said. Even if the agreement concerning architecture and dentistry should be dissolved, Hammond said, an agreement concerning the other majors can probably be renegotiated.

might never appear before Congress," Rudman said.

He said North's action will change the nature of the investigation when he does appear, probably in mid-July.

"It becomes in my view adversarial," Rudman said.

North, a Marine officer and a former official on the staff of the National Security Council, is also under investigation by Lawrence Walsh, the independent counsel who is attempting to determine whether laws have been broken.

Rudman said that if the House or Senate cited North for contempt, he would have the right to pursue the matter at various court levels, a process which could take months to complete.

And he and Inouye said the panels are determined to complete public hearings before Congress begins its scheduled summer recess on Aug. 8.

A delay, Rudman said, might make it possible for North's lawyers to "string it out so that it might be impossible for the independent counsel to delay any action he might wish to take."

In other words, if Walsh were to indict North, that might well make it impossible for Congress to simultaneously call him as a public witness.

North has already been granted limited immunity from prosecution in an effort to compel his testimony before congressional investigators.

The two senators, asked how a private appearance might violate North's rights, said they had no answer.

"We've contended his position is untenable," Inouye said.

"As a practicing lawyer I always had great difficulty in inventing frivolous defenses," Rudman added.

A spokesman for North's lawyers said they were unavailable for comment.

Hamilton, at his news conference, said North's attorneys are contending in the first place that a deposition is not a proceeding of a congressional committee under the meaning of the immunity law.

Secondly, he said, they argue that such considerations as secrecy, access to documents and the opportunity for "double questioning" pose a threat to North's legal rights.

Sheldon

Researching requires getting the "feel" of an area and talking to people who actually live and work there, Sheldon said.

Having lived in several small towns during his life, Sheldon found the people in the Junction City and Manhattan area to be friendly and helpful — something he believes true to the Midwest, he said.

Sheldon came to K-State to develop his main character and her career as an assistant professor in political science. He visited with Joseph Hajda, professor of political science.

"He described my office as a model for the story," Hajda said. "Using a tape recorder, he recorded the details, such as a world map, assignment papers and pictures on my wall. In the book, he changed a few details to fit the character."

"We talked for about 45 minutes. He had many questions and asked for a copy of some of my assignments."

The character was developed during their discussion while sitting in his office, Hajda said.

Sheldon said he believes the whole purpose in writing is to provide the reader with the details and atmosphere of the locations of his novels. Readers know when he has not been to one of the places in his work, he said, so he tries to use actual experiences such as the taste of a meal or the details in the settings.

"If I write about a place, you know I have been there," Sheldon said.

As his plot emerges, so do his characters. A typical day of writing can result in about 50 pages, he said. At the end of the day, the content of those pages are sometimes as big a surprise to him as the final copy is to his readers.

"As characters take over the plot, it evolves," Sheldon said.

Sheldon said many readers, including himself, stop to count the number of pages to the end of the chapter; after finishing those, they shut the book.

In his own novels, Sheldon tries to capture the readers' attention to the extent they cannot help peeking at the next chapter and want to keep going.

Henton

"A dog in a wheelchair is about a disaster," he said. "Physical therapy is one way to get that function back."

Henton said she also gives dogs and cats medicated solution baths, or dips, for ticks and fleas. Henton, who usually gives cats a bath of this type, said she has only given one whirlpool bath to a cat.

"The fascinating thing about Evelyn — some people have it, some don't, some acquire it, some don't — is she can take a cat that no one else can handle and have it in the tub," Fortney said.

College

one staff position. Thus, the increased emphasis could have cost the college much more.

Money is needed for equipment, Stamey said. Most of the departments have equipment that needs to be bought, replaced or repaired, Stamey said. But the money needed for improvements cannot be eliminated from other programs.

"We need hundreds of thousands of dollars to bring them up to where they would be reasonably adequate," he said. "There's no way that money is available in other departments."

Scientific research grants enable many of the science programs to generate money. This benefits the programs, the colleges and the area's economy, Stamey said.

For instance, the Department of Physics received $1 million from the state of Kansas and $5 million from the U.S. Department of Energy.

"This is a good investment for Kansas and especially Manhattan," Stamey said. "But the reason we should do it is for the educational value and the profound advances in technology it can make."

In addition to improving scientific research, Stamey said the college is also planning to devote resources to aid undergraduates. The mathematics undergraduate studies and the English writing labs are two areas scheduled for improvements.

Family petitions for payment Soviet eye doctors to examine Peltier

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

A demand for more than $106,000 compensation from the Riley County Police Department for the death and funeral of Stephen Lohmeyer has received no formal reply, said Van Smith, attorney for the family.

No formal case has been filed yet; however, filing a suit is a possibility for the future. Smith said an error was made in the handling of the case for which the entire RCPD is responsible.

Alvan Johnson, RCPD director, said he believes negotiations taking place between the insurance companies will fail, and the case will have to be settled in court.

Lohmeyer was found dead in his car the morning of April 11, after he committed suicide by running a garden hose from the exhaust pipe to the inside of the car. An eyewitness observed Lohmeyer moving in the vehicle at 11:45 p.m. on April 10 and called the RCPD around midnight to report a person apparently asleep in a car with the engine running.

Smith said the dispatcher on duty, Ron Lichtenhan, filled out his report saying the call had been responded to, but in fact, the report had not been investigated. A representative from the RCPD did not arrive at the scene until 10:30 the following morning.

"I've been talking to a number of experts, and we now think there's a good chance he could have been resuscitated and saved," Smith said, "if the police had arrived in a reasonable amount of time."

"The police department receives a great many such calls, especially in the winter when a person sleeping in a car might leave it running," Johnson said. "Often the officer finds the car and driver GOA (gone on arrival)."

"I'm not an expert on suicide," Smith said, "but if his life had been saved, there's always a chance he could have been given treatment."

Smith sent Johnson a letter May 19 on behalf of the Lohmeyer family. Smith said the letter contained a demand for $100,000 for the "loss of a son by a family" and more than $6,000 for funeral expenses. Smith said he expects to receive a formal reply by the end of June.

Smith said Johnson turned the demand over to the RCPD's insurance company, Imperial Casualty Indemnity Co. of Omaha, where it was sent to a case adjuster and finally to the company's attorney. A representative from the company said the current status of the negotiations is not available for public knowledge at this time.

In the meantime, Smith said he has been gathering information pertinent to the case. He said if a suit is filed, it will be based on the error made by the RCPD.

"There's no way to tell at this point where this thing will go," Smith said. "After I receive a formal reply from the Riley County Police, I'll have a better idea of what will happen."

Smith said a case will be filed if the RCPD does not satisfy the Lohmeyers' demands. Smith said he plans to handle the case in court if the RCPD does not agree to pay the more than $106,000.

"Of course, I will take any offer to my clients to see what they think," he said.

Johnson said he believes Smith doesn't have a case based on prior law. He said Smith has referred to current cases concerning a non-discretionary function — the theory certain workers must follow certain procedures without using judgment. Smith will attempt to show that Lichtenhan had no right to use discretion in taking the action he did, he said.

Johnson said Lichtenhan made a mistake, but Smith will have problems making a connection between LEAVENWORTH — An American Indian imprisoned in the slaying of two FBI agents was examined by a doctor at the U.S. Penitentiary in Leavenworth Monday — one day before two Soviet physicians were to examine him.

Dr. Marc Whitacre, a retina specialist at the University of Kansas Medical Center, examined Leonard Peltier, 41.

Whitacre's boss, Dr. Ted Lawwill, chairman of the KU ophthalmology department, said he could not discuss the case without Peltier's permission but that a report would be sent to the prison.

However, Trisha Stanton of Santa Fe, N.M., spokeswoman for the Leonard Peltier Media Bureau, said she talked to Peltier and he said "the doctor told him that the condition in his eye has progressed so far that it is not treatable."

"Leonard tried to get him to say if it would have been treatable if he had seen him sooner but could not get a specific answer," Stanton said.

Officials at the prison and U.S. Bureau of Prisons refused to discuss the Peltier case Monday, but Stanton said a hemorrhage behind the retina has caused blindness in Peltier's left eye since November. She said it was feared he also would lose the sight in the right eye.

Two Soviet specialists — Dr. Eduard Avetisov, president of the Soviet Society of Ophthalmologists, and Dr. L.A. Katsnelson — were given permission to examine Peltier at the prison Tuesday. Prison officials refused to confirm that the two doctors would examine Peltier.

Revenue collectors emphasize pressure

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Three Internal Revenue Service officers told a Senate panel Monday that they feel great pressure from managers to seize taxpayers' property even though less drastic action might be more productive for the government.

Shirley Garcia of the Landover, Md., IRS office said revenue officers are given the message that "the more harassment they give the public, the more money they collect — it does look good on their daily report."

"It's now considered a quality error" if an officer does not seize the property of a delinquent taxpayer, said Robert Miller, a revenue officer stationed in Wheaton, Md.

Robert Brown, who works out of the Landover office and is preparing to retire after 26 years with the IRS, said he was once downgraded by superiors for trying to impress on new trainees that they should be courteous to taxpayers.

The three revenue officers testified before the Senate Finance subcommittee that oversees the IRS. The panel has uncovered evidence that some IRS managers routinely judge employees on the basis of how much tax money they collect and how much property they seize, in direct violation of written IRS directives.

Sen. John Heinz, R-Pa., a member of the subcommittee, said some of the IRS methods are tantamount to telling employees to "go out and act like mob-employed enforcers."

The subcommittee made public a memorandum that the chief of one of the agency's collections branches had sent to his group managers. The memo complained about poor performance by the revenue officers who

Lobbyists advise Dole to back spending limit

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — Leaders of a public interest lobbying group Monday warned Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole that an "absolutely intolerable" filibuster against campaign spending limits will cost him in a state key to his presidential hopes.

Leaders of Common Cause held a news conference in Iowa, site of an early test of presidential strength next February, to denounce Dole's part in GOP moves to stall the measure and release a letter written by 26 Iowa groups backing the spending limits.

Steve Sovern, of Marion, head of the Iowa Common Cause affiliate, said his group will pressure Dole to allow a vote on the measure, which would allow partial public financing of Senate campaigns, limit spending and limit contributions from special-interest political action committees.

He warned that Iowa is the wrong place to fight against limiting campaign spending.

"In Iowa, there is a special concern," Sovern said. "Iowa is referred to by many as a playpen for PACs."

"Iowa is where the action is," said Archibald Cox, the group's head.

Sovern said Cox's appearance at the news conference and the letter from labor, church and community groups was a clear signal that Iowans don't approve of Dole's role in blocking the spending limits.

Suspect receives term for stabbing

By The Collegian Staff

An 18-year-old Manhattan man was sentenced Friday to 15 years to life in prison in connection with the fatal stabbing of a Manhattan cab driver.

District Judge George Scott sentenced Jerry Thomas Odell, 18, in the Geary County District Court to 15 years to life for second-degree murder, and five to 20 years for aggravated robbery, with the controlling sentence being 15 years to life. The ruling was in connection with the death of Chuck Primm, 42, Manhattan.

On May 27, Odell, who was 17 at the time of the stabbing, pleaded guilty to these charges and waived his right to be prosecuted as a juvenile and his right to a preliminary hearing.

Odell and a companion, Stephan R. Stratton, 18, Manhattan, were charged March 18 with conspiracy to commit robbery and first-degree murder, aggravated robbery and attempted first-degree murder in connection with the Jan. 4 stabbing.

More street signs to decorate campus

By The Collegian Staff

All over campus new street-identification signs are popping up. The $9,800 signs are one aspect of Phase One in a four-phase sign plan for K-State.

"In the past, we have had a campus map with the street names on it, but the streets have not been identified by any type of sign," said Mark Taussig, landscape architect for Facilities Planning.

Funding for these signs in the $78,800 Phase One came mostly from the parking fund generated from parking fees. The fund has about $400,000, said Capt. Charles Beckom of the KSU Police Department.

According to the signage proposal, cost for the next three phases will be $264,000, while the total cost of the four phases will be $342,800.

The proposal further stated that the visitor information center in the Union parking lot received 11,939 inquiries for information or parking permits in April 1986. About 90 percent of the visitors gave the Union as their destination.

The newly installed signs are more attractive than the typical street-identification sign and will provide information easily to the campus community, Beckom said.

They will also be more likely to withstand the abuse sometimes sustained by signs, he said. The police department recovers 70 to 100 signs a year on campus that have been stolen or vandalized in some way.

In addition to the street signs, Beckom said they are exchanging the old parking lot identification signs for redesigned signs. The signs will first be changed in the Union parking lot on a trial basis before erecting the remaining signs if results are favorable.

Taussig said the street-identification signs are a small part of the proposal to change many of the signs about K-State.

Phase One also calls for the addition of new signs in the Jardine Terrace area, Beckom said. The signs would be for street-identification and would match the city's street design. The Department of Housing will foot the $2,000 bill.

A third aspect of Phase One will include two campus identification signs with a bronze casting of K-State's official seal and engraved lettering on a smooth limestone slab. One will be located at Blumont and North Manhattan avenues and the second at Anderson Avenue and 17th Street. Each sign will cost $29,000.

The fourth part will be campus pedestrian information signs pointing out the sign's location on a campus map. The cost for these five signs will be $4,000.

The final planned addition in Phase One is signs directing traffic in the vicinity of Geary and Riley counties to K-State via the state highways. At a cost of $5,000, the signs for this phase will be furnished and installed by the Kansas Department of Transportation, Beckom said.

At a price of $100,000, Phase Two includes an information center on 17th Street and street improvements.

INTERNATIONAL German hostages affect extradition

BONN, West Germany — Security sources said Monday fear for the lives of two West German hostages has prompted the Bonn government to decide against extraditing Mohammed Ali Hamadi to the United States for trial on air piracy and murder charges.

U.S. Attorney General Edwin Meese III will be in Bonn Tuesday to discuss the case of the 22-year-old Lebanese.

If Hamadi is not extradited, he will be tried in West Germany on murder and air piracy charges, Bonn government spokesman Friedhelm Ost said.

President Reagan said "Yes," when asked Monday if he would be satisfied with such an arrangement. "I knew and have known that he's going to be tried for murder wherever he's tried," the president said.

Hamadi was among four people indicted in the United States in the June 1985 hijacking of a TWA jetliner to Beirut. A U.S. Navy diver was killed in the hijacking and other Americans were held hostage for 17 days.

In Washington, Justice Department spokesman Pat Korten said that in Bonn, Meese would "reiterate the United States' position, which is that, all things considered, we are hopeful they will honor our request for extradition."

Ost said a decision on Hamadi will be made at a Cabinet meeting Wednesday.

'Severe' sentences given to arsonists

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico — Three former Dupont Plaza employees who pleaded guilty were given prison terms ranging from 75 years to 99 years Monday for setting a New Year's Eve fire that killed 97 people at the beachfront hotel.

Federal Judge Jose A. Fuste said the sentences were near maximum because the defendants, all members of Teamsters Local 901, used sabotage to force the hotel to meet contract demands and such tactics are too common in Puerto Rico. Union officials have denied involvement.

"I cannot sanction such a thing and I cannot become one of those who...say this is the desired way to bring about results," he said.

NATIONAL Board gives time to fired NSC aide

WASHINGTON — Congressional committees investigating the Iran-Contra affair Monday granted Lt. Col. Oliver North an extra day to comply with a subpoena for documents, a possible indication of progress in talks aimed at setting rules for North's public testimony next month.

The action came after leaders of the House and Senate panels met with North's attorneys in an effort to ensure the testimony of the affair's central witness in a format that gives the committees control over his appearance, including prior private testimony before investigators.

The committees' chairmen and ranking minority members — Sens. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, and Warren Rudman, R-N.H., and Reps. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., and Dick Cheney, R-Wyo. — personally participated in a 1½ hour meeting Monday with their top counsel and with North's lawyer, Brendan Sullivan.

"It was an opportunity to inform Sullivan that Congress would not enter into any agreements that would restrict Congress' prerogatives" in the investigation, said a committee staff source, who spoke only on condition of anonymity.

Sullivan told investigators a week ago his client would refuse to appear in a private committee session, arguing that such testimony wouldn't be covered by the limited immunity from prosecution that North has been voted by Congress.

Subpoena denied in lobbyist's trial

WASHINGTON — A federal judge ruled Monday that Canadian Ambassador Allan Gottlieb cannot be compelled to testify at the perjury trial of former White House aide Michael K. Deaver.

U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson denied independent counsel Whitney North Seymour's motion to compel service on Gottlieb and quashed the subpoena.

Deaver is accused in a five-count indictment of lying about the extent of his involvement with the acid rain issue before he resigned as deputy White House chief of staff to become a lobbyist for Canada and other clients.

Seymour said Gottlieb was the only witness who could prove that Deaver lied when he said he could not recall having lunch Jan. 5, 1985, with the ambassador and his wife, Sondra.

Seymour touched off a diplomatic flap last month when he sent an FBI agent to serve subpoenas on Gottlieb and his wife at the Canadian Embassy.

REGIONAL Stephan: no limit on special session

TOPEKA — When the Kansas Legislature is called into special session, there is no deadline for adjournment and no constitutional limitation on what lawmakers can consider, Attorney General Robert T. Stephan ruled in a legal opinion made public Monday.

The opinion, sought by Sen. Eric Yost, R-Wichita, outlined what the Legislature can and can't do during a special session Gov. Mike Hayden is expected to call in late August for consideration of a proposed highway construction program.

Stephan said the Kansas Constitution empowers the governor to call a special session "on extraordinary occasions" and requires him or her to send legislators a message on the condition of the state at the opening of every session.

However, quoting a 1899 Kansas Supreme Court opinion, Stephan said the Legislature can do whatever it wants after being called for a special session.

MU police guard apartheid protest

COLUMBIA, Mo. — In a major policy change, University of Missouri police were ordered Monday to provide around-the-clock protection for protest shanties on campus after the dismantling and burning of a shanty early in the morning.

Interim Chancellor Duane Stucky said the move was necessary to ensure the safety of the area near Jesse Hall, the main administration building. In the past, university officials have ordered the shanties torn down.

"The University of Missouri-Columbia condemns any acts of destruction of the property of others," Stucky said.

Activists protesting apartheid, South Africa's system of racial segregation, have found their shanties destroyed about twice a week for the last three months.

The shanties are meant to represent the ramshackle communities in which poor blacks live in South Africa. The protesters want the university to divest itself of $150 million in holdings in companies that do business in South Africa.

In the latest incident, the shanty was torn down and its parts taken away and burned. Police found the debris before 5 a.m., and an anti-apartheid activist later returned the remains to the protest site.

S. Korean leaders to consider reform

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — President Chun Doo-hwan made a dramatic reversal Monday after nearly two weeks of violent street protests, agreeing to meet with opposition leaders and consider demands for democratic reform.

His opponents insisted all political detainees be freed before the talks, expected later this week. Police say at least 8,000 people have been arrested since anti-government agitation began June 10 and thousands remain in jail.

There were fewer reports Monday of protests and fights with riot police. Most of the violence occurred at universities.

Thousands of students hurling firebombs and rocks battled police around at least four Seoul campuses and protesters briefly overran at least one riot squad. Police fired volley after volley of tear gas and attacked with armored cars.

The president said he would be willing to meet with Kim Young-sam, head of the Reunification Democratic Party, and other opposition groups and would consider demands for reform. Kim's party is the main political opposition.

Chun's foes demand direct presidential elections, but the former general declared April 13 that his successor would be chosen by the current electoral college system and debate on constitutional change would be postponed until after the 1988 Summer Olympics in Seoul. He has chosen Roh Tae-woo, a former general, to succeed him in February.

News reports said the government would release many of the people detained since June 10, when the ruling party endorsed Roh's candidacy and protests began, and that Chun and Kim were expected to meet in two or three days.

The political violence is the worst since Chun gained power after President Park Chung-hee was assassinated in 1979. The United States, which has 40,000 soldiers in South Korea, has urged both sides to resume talks and avoid violence.

Gaston J. Sigur, assistant secretary of state and Washington's top Asian policy official, was due in Seoul on Tuesday.

Roh, who heads the ruling Democratic Justice Party, announced the president's switch of position after holding what he called "frank talks" with Chun.

"I recommended it is desirable that the president meet political elders and opposition leaders to work out settlements," he told reporters, adding the government is preparing a package of reforms.

The newspaper Chosun Ilbo reported in its Tuesday editions the package would include renewed debate on changing the constitution and presidential election system.

Kim insisted that opposition leader Kim Dae-jung be released from house arrest, which was imposed April 8, and that all people detained in the protests be freed.

Architecture plan requires additional University funds

By KIM ZOLLMAN
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This is the second in a nine-part series dealing with the five-year strategic plan for the University's colleges.

The College of Architecture and Design answered President Jon Wefald's planning charge with an elaborate five-year plan going beyond the charge, said Mark Lapping, dean of the college.

However, Lapping said, "We didn't even come close to what we wanted" because the funds given by the University to support the plan were $225,000 instead of the $750,000 requested.

The plan defines "what we want to be when we grow up as a school," Lapping said.

The purpose of the college, he said, is "to maintain the quality and integrity of a studio experience (rather than a lecture hall with 100 students)...we're not going to compromise" on the education from the college.

The college has cut back on the elective classes as a remedy to receiving a fraction of what it requested. Lapping said a faculty meeting is necessary to determine which programs have highest priority for allocation of resources to ensure "an open and democratic process" within the college.

The planning process developed by the College Committee on Planning consisted of Lapping reading Wefald's charge at a faculty meeting. Then, the planning charge was distributed to 18 task groups composed of faculty, staff and students.

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

The task groups wrote reports to the Drafting Committee, which included Lapping, a department head, a program director, a CCOP nominee and two faculty members. The Drafting Committee wrote a draft report that was reviewed by the whole college before submitting the report to Wefald.

"Over 85 percent of the faculty...and some students... (spent) an outrageous amount of time" on the plan, Lapping said.

They spent several Saturdays working on it, and closed the college on Wednesday, Feb. 11, for an "All College Planning Day."

Some of the 18 tasks in the college's "Strategic Planning Report" include "maintaining excellence in landscape and interior architecture," investing in a Kansas City program, consolidating interior architecture and interior design, managing enrollment and adding a housing program. The plan outlined better ways to recruit, retain and develop faculty.

Lapping said, "we were lucky" because no programs were cut.

The report also suggests further cooperation between the college and departments in other schools such as landscape architecture with horticulture in the College of Agriculture, environmental design with art in the College of Arts and Sciences, and architecture and design with architectural engineering in the College of Engineering.

The report states, "additional faculty resources must be matched with appropriate increases in staff, operating funds, equipment, especially computer resources, and other enhancements to facilities, workshops and libraries."

Committee to request funds for campus fine arts museum

By PEGGY SHANDY
Collegian Reporter

K-State has an art collection of about 1,000 items including works by Pablo Picasso, Henri Matisse and Thomas Benton, and no place to house them, said Ruth Ann Wefald, member of a committee studying a proposal to build an art museum.

About 90 percent of K-State's artworks are displayed in various campus offices and buildings, while the remaining 10 percent are stored.

Several pieces of art are sent throughout the state as displays, while others are loaned to institutions for display, Wefald said.

"It's a shame to have to loan them out," she said. "It would be nice to have a home for our works."

Wefald said a program committee has been formed to examine the possibility for support of an art museum on campus.

"We have been working for half a year now — meeting off and on," she said.

The committee has conducted a feasibility study to determine a proposed budget, possible building sites and interest in the project.

"The budget itself is about $3.8 million. We are looking to cut this down," Wefald said.

Four possible building sites have been considered: an addition on the north side of the existing gallery in the Union, an addition to the north side of McCain Auditorium, a free-standing structure to the east of McCain and a combination addition-renovation to Memorial Stadium, she said.

"Any site selected for the construction of a fine arts museum must meet several criteria," such as visitor and student accessibility, good parking and close proximity to other fine arts and performing arts activities, Wefald said.

Even though an addition to the Union would be partially underground, it would reduce the open space in the area as would a free-standing structure, she said.

"There has been quite a bit of support to adding on to McCain. But again, it would take away from our open spaces," she said.

Wefald said funds for the project are expected to come from private sources such as alumni, friends of K-State and others who want to contribute to the project.

One idea under consideration would be to take a fine arts awareness program throughout the state. A Celebrate the Fine Arts program would include a student performing group from K-State that would travel to rural and urban areas, Wefald said.

"We would be just trying to build the awareness, not necessarily a money-building project," she said. "It is a long-range plan — two to five years down the road — and we must first build awareness."

Jury delivers to public parlous license to act

Last Tuesday, a New York State Supreme Court jury returned a verdict of "not guilty" against charges that Bernhard Goetz, the "subway vigilante," committed assault with a deadly weapon against four youths in 1985.

The implications of this verdict are far-reaching — not only for the citizens of New York City, but for people across the United States as well.

The message is clear — the citizens of New York City will no longer tolerate the surge of violence which plagues their city. They may, in fact, take the law into their own hands.

But the danger of this attitude is apparent. The young men Goetz shot claim they simply asked him for $5. Goetz claims he was afraid they would rob him, and his defense attorney argued that the mere presence of that fear was justification for his actions, which included shooting one of the victims in the back.

Goetz and his attorney claimed that the "menacing glances," and "body language," of the youths provided sufficient provocation for Goetz to pull his gun.

Goetz was afraid, as are many people in urban and some rural areas today. But "menacing glances" are a subjective perception, and "body language" can sometimes be misconstrued.

Fear does not justify violence. If we fall prey to fear, any one of us could be shot for seeming suspicious to someone else.

Everyone needs facts on AIDS

It's depressing to think there are still a lot of people who don't know much about the AIDS pandemic, since ignorance is its greatest weapon.

The ignorant are not only 10th-grade dropouts living in Harlem ghettos. Even college students seem to be uneducated about this disease.

AIDS is a word that strikes fear into us at one time or another. We think of certain death, and many of us think of it only for gay men and intravenous drug users. We also think of ourselves as incapable of being infected.

The panic caused by ignorance even reaches high-ranking politicians like President Ronald Reagan and Attorney General Edwin Meese III, who think that insulating prisoners and immigrants testing positive for the virus is an answer. They don't seem to realize that education is society's best hope.

Most of us know once victims are infected with the disease, their days are numbered, and AIDS is an acronym for acquired immune deficiency syndrome. Most of us also know there is no vaccine or cure.

The virus kills by annihilating the immune system, making the victim susceptible to rare forms of pneumonia and cancer. Most of us don't know that a victim can carry the disease and not have symptoms for several years.

KIM ZOLLMAN
Collegian Columnist

AIDS is not the disease of only gay men and drug addicts. People outside of these risk groups delude themselves by thinking otherwise. Although those in high risk groups make up the majority of cases, they are not the only ones carrying the disease.

The New York Times in a March 1987 article has photographs of several different infected people from a 39-year-old former chef to a newborn in a Harlem hospital. It has good reason to refer to AIDS as a "worldwide scourge."

Like any other disease, AIDS does not consciously select its victims on sexual preference or drug addiction. According to medical experts, victims are infected because of sexual contact or exchange of blood and not by kissing, not by sitting on the same toilet seat nor by just being in the presence of a victim.

Many heterosexuals don't realize these two groups were hit first because of their behavior. Homosexual men are more promiscuous than heterosexuals or lesbians, and drug addicts are known for sharing unsterilized needles.

The heterosexual community also tends to forget about bisexuals, prostitutes and contaminated blood. Although testing was developed in 1985, there are still some samples that slip through, since nothing is 100 percent.

Like any other socially transmitted disease, AIDS has a chain. For instance, a woman has a one-night stand with an infected drug user. The next night, she's picked up by another man and infects him and so on. When she wants to have children, her babies will have short lives because they, too, will have the disease.

Even though abstinence and using sterilized needles is the best way to prevent exposure to AIDS, there has been a lot of talk about "safe sex." It not only involves using a condom, but knowing the partner — knowing more than just his or her last name and major.

No matter what precautions we take against this disease, until AIDS no longer poses a dire threat to us, we cannot bury our heads in the sand and hope it goes away.

Paradise shows its prejudices

I guess I'd seen one too many airline commercials showing waves lapping on sun drenched beaches complete with bosomy blondes lazing on the sand, because I began to get this hankering to be on one of those island paradises. Unfortunately, being only a semi-respectable starving student, I didn't quite have the funds to jet off to Jamaica, the Virgin Islands or San Juan.

So I went to Aggieville instead — that pleasure island just off the coast of the University. I thought I'd check it out. I'd see where the fun people went to relax and shed their cares — some drinking instead of thinking and maybe, just maybe, I could imagine an ocean of water to replace the ocean of grain. I called a local denizen to serve as guide and we headed out, fortified with some Jamaican rum.

First stop on our itinerary was Brother's Tavern. The name had a nice ring to it and at the door we sensed paradise. I could see through the smoky windows visions of golden flesh, taps running endlessly and, yes folks, I could even hear Jimmy Buffett singing a tropical song. In short, islanding galore.

Better yet, white American islanding — the safe sort out on Key West, away from the shanty town poor of Jamaica. There would be no unpleasant reminders of poverty here. The notes floated out the door — sirens beckoning me to come inside. But it was not to be.

Seems my friend had forgotten his student ID. He hadn't packed it in his travel kit, so this island was closed to us. Even worse, I discovered the real problem was we'd somehow forgotten our biweekly haircuts — it just slipped our minds, honest. We weren't quite up to the standards of the place. Just when I thought I'd found an island haven I discovered, horrors, that I was one of those shanty town outcasts. This is what the doorman thought, anyway.

Through the wonders of capitalism, rescue from this dilemma offered itself if I was willing to pay a mere $20 cover charge. All sins can be forgotten in America if you have enough cash. I couldn't see paying to enter a heaven even if it was an island heaven. Remember, that's why I went to Aggieville instead of hopping a jet. So it was bump bump back out on the street.

Here I made the acquaintance of another reject who hadn't been allowed inside. But to add to my budding confusion, his every hair was in place. He had a haircut every week and his hair wouldn't have been out of place in a hurricane for he was a soldier and it was that short. We commiserated on our mutual problem then parted ways confident that we, at least, knew we were humans.

Next stop on our itinerary was down the street at Last Chance. There was some island music wafting out onto the streets and even though it looked more like an old-time saloon than the beach bar I was looking for, I figured maybe I'd find out differently.

Everyone was out in force on the patio while the inside was peopled with just a select few. They were so few they gave one the impression they'd forgotten the way to get outside. Meanwhile, their companions slowly settled among them and died off one by one over the years — ample proof of the adage "man does not live by barbecue and beer alone."

I knew I'd found at least one sort of islander — men who were islands unto themselves and their bottle of Corona. The place even had shuffleboard, a must for any self-respecting nursing home. I might have stayed there forever beached on a bar stool in a pleasant torpor if a temporary influx of patio dwellers hadn't swept in for replenishment of the alcoholic sort and then swept me outside in their wake.

Outside was a different story. For one, at least these people still remembered how to get outside. Some of you might quibble that this was only because they were outside, but that's too deep for me. Everyone here was fresh and young and sunny. They looked as if they'd only been there for minutes unlike the inside bunch. They gathered in groups with brightly colored array chatting away about sun and drink and party and no think. Others watched the parade of flesh up and down the street. All this was punctuated by the sounds of reggae that almost convinced me I'd found that island I'd been dreaming of.

Being human, I began to cavil that the ground was concrete and the only waves I could hear turned out on closer examination to be motorists buzzing up and down the street. Imagine trying to surf off one of those passing metal waves. Ouch! Some quirk in my brain inspired me to leave this little oasis and drift back out on the street. I think maybe that the last Corona had persuaded me that it was a beach after all.

This is where my story turns sad, depending on your point of view. I was just about to continue the tour of Aggieville islands when I ran into my soldier acquaintance. This time he looked a little worse for the wear. Seems that cast out on the street with no bar to call home he had stumbled into a pack of students. Like our friend, the doorman, they didn't take too kindly to this interloper. They had the idea that to be anywhere in Aggieville you had to have a student ID. When he failed to produce the item, they demonstrated this belief on his nose and body.

Unfortunately, his boot camp training had only prepared him for the rigors of machine-gun fire on a South American jungle island. He was caught unaware by the fists of youths he was in the Army to protect — a sad, but true, tale.

So we did the only smart thing we'd thought of all night and went back home to create our own island safe from the zone. Who needs to visit a tropical island with petty dictators and peasants when you can find them close to home?

The politics of porn

Editor,
A few weeks ago Jerry Anderson, in a guest column, commented that pornography seemed to serve the beneficial purpose of allowing individuals a release from repression. Anderson seems to refer to conclusions reached by a 1970 Presidential Commission on Pornography report which the 1986 Presidential Commission has rejected as "starkly obsolete."

Today, the pornography industry is an $8 billion a year industry. A governor's report stated that it is dominated by organized crime. Dolores Hayden in "Redesigning the American Dream" indicated that, "Pornography is a bigger, more profitable industry in the United States than all legitimate film and record business combined." Pornography's abuse of women and children by eroticizing coercion, humiliation, torture and sometimes even death are the obvious reasons for seeing it as harmful. But it is also harmful in less obvious ways.

According to Susan Brownmiller, rape and pornography serve as the tools by which men obtain and maintain their supremacy. When we think about pornography's effects beyond its effects on its direct victims, we can see that it victimizes us all. It encourages men and women to play the "protection" racket game. Whether the image is James Bond, Rambo or even Bill Cosby our society ensures that men, whether father, husband or boss, will take the controlling, "protective" and defining role toward women in public and in the home.

Pornography, whether "hard core" or "soft core," is patently political. It functions to define women in terms of men's needs. The question then becomes not one of maintaining free speech but whose free speech will be maintained. As it is now, the terror tactics of pornography are used to enforce women's acquiescence to male supremacy. Pornography is used to enforce women's submission and silence. The sad fact is that men, in defining women for themselves, often find women extremely puzzling and sometimes quite impossible.

Nature is now lost

Editor,
The campus has flowers of diverse kinds, countless and ubiquitous, in plots big and small, triangular, circular and square, on top of rising slopes and at the bottom of open spaces; flowers climb profusely on fences, and in places, bushes laden with flowers spread over ample grounds.

But they waft a strong and compulsive sense of artificiality and plasticity, not one puff or breath of perfume and sweetness. They have been tampered with and deflowered by man to be more pleasing to the visual senses, but robbed of their aesthetic beauty of perfume and sweetness.

Grown by Nature untampered, one patch of flowers, one bush of roses will waft sweet suffocating smells for distances around. With so many flowers on campus, you should be in a paradise of many mingled sweet perfumes wherever you go.

The University's top administration should set up a committee to get the campus flowers back to nature. It will take some years to "re-breed" them back to how nature had them, but it will be worth it.

D.J. is inspirational

Editor,
As I tuned in the campus radio station, KSDB-FM, last Tuesday night I found one of the best music shows I have ever heard. Politics and rock came together sometimes harshly and often beautifully on Ed Schiappa's Politrock show.

As someone who has been collecting political music for seven years, I was surprised to hear how many groups I had missed. Now I'm going to add the Washington Squares and a few others to my collection.

For anyone with a social conscience, I highly recommend this show. The variety of folk, reggae, and the many styles of rock is matched by the variety of issues including apartheid, race relations, war, nuclear arms, brutal police, Central America, Native Americans, Nancy Reagan and more.

I've found political music to be very inspiring, and K-State could sure use some inspiration right now. As I've heard it, the president of the United States may be visiting K-State in early September to present a Landon Lecture (I bet he won't take questions from the audience).

So let's get ready to rock with Rappin' Ron, the double-speak fiend! Of course, he might not be able to make it here if he decides to perform at his impeachment hearings; but for now we can still enjoy the music on Tuesday nights from 10 to midnight. My compliments to KSDB.

Coleman 38th pick in NBA draft

From Staff and Wire Reports

NEW YORK — Norris Coleman, former K-State basketball standout, was drafted by the Los Angeles Clippers in the second round and was the 38th pick overall of the National Basketball Association draft Monday.

Coleman was the leading scorer for the 'Cats last season with 22.3 points per contest. In '85-'86, he was the leading freshman scorer in the country, averaging 21.9 points per contest.

In Coleman's second season he was forced to sit out until Jan. 17 due to an NCAA ruling on his eligibility. In the last 15 games of the regular season in which Coleman played he averaged 22.3 points per contest. Assistant Coach Dana Altman stated that he, along with the other coaches, knew Coleman would go high in the draft.

"We knew he would at least go in the first two rounds," Altman said. "Being drafted by the L.A. Clippers on the surface seems to be a good team for Norris to be drafted by. The Clippers are a struggling team and there will probably be a lot of changes made. This gives Norris a shot at making the team."

Coleman was the Clippers' first choice in the second round. The Clippers had three first-round picks. Their first, No. 4 overall, was Reggie Williams of Georgetown, a 6-7 forward in college who is projected as a guard in the NBA.

Williams, who earned MVP honors in the NCAA championship victory over Houston as a freshman, developed well as a scorer and all-around player in his junior and senior seasons, averaging 17.6 and 23.6 points, respectively.

The Clippers' second, the 13th pick overall, was 6-11 Joe Wolf of North Carolina and the Clippers' third pick of the first round, the 17th pick overall, was 6-8 forward Ken Norman of Illinois.

The San Antonio Spurs, who sank to the bottom of the Midwest Division standings the last two seasons after years of having solid teams, took Navy's David Robinson with the first pick in the NBA draft.

The Spurs selected Robinson although a two-year Navy commitment will keep him from playing in the NBA for two seasons.

There is also considerable doubt whether Spurs President Angelo Drossos can sign the 7-foot-1 center during the year the team will retain exclusive rights to him.

If San Antonio doesn't sign Robinson before the 1988 draft, a judge or an arbitrator will determine whether it will keep the rights to him for another year.

The Phoenix Suns, with the No. 2 pick, took 6-9 forward Armon Gilliam of Nevada-

Las Vegas. Gilliam, the son of a Baptist minister and nicknamed "The Hammer" for his physical style, held up a Phoenix jersey with No. 35 after his selection.

Seaver's comeback finished; arm has 'no more pitches'

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Tom Seaver, saying "there are no more pitches" in his right arm, announced his retirement Monday after a comeback try with the New York Mets.

"It's a sense of mixed emotions because I'm announcing my retirement," the 42-year-old Seaver said at a Shea Stadium news conference. "It was a very easy decision to make. Based on my own evaluation in the way I was throwing the last couple of weeks, I was not pleased with my progress. As a matter of fact, I felt I was regressing."

"When they called me, they needed help and I wanted to give it an honest shot. I realized I can't help them as a pitcher and I trust my own intelligence and my own heart in making that decision."

Seaver, who joined the Mets in late May as a free agent, did not pitch in a regular season game before calling it quits.

"The time has come when I can't play any more," he said. "I had the opportunity to see if there were another three months or another 15 games left in my arm. There are no more pitches there. I've used them all up."

Nine-year golf veteran new U.S. Open champ

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — The questions have been answered for Scott Simpson, and he'll take two weeks to savor the joyous reply.

"I always wondered if I could be good enough to do something like this," the low-key Simpson said Sunday after he delayed Watson's comeback and acquired the U.S. Open golf championship.

The answer, of course, was an unqualified "yes."

At least for the moment, there are no doubts. The self-questions that have plagued his career have been set aside.

"When I won the NCAA (twice for Southern California), I didn't think I was good enough to do that," Simpson said. "I've had doubts through my pro career (which included three previous victories). I didn't think I was good enough to do this. I'm surprised I won, to tell you the truth."

Tom Watson, who finished one stroke behind, was not.

"Scott is a very good player. He made all the shots when he had to make them. I played well enough to win. Scott just beat me," Watson said.

Simpson, a quietly proficient player who is noted by his peers for his patience, will take a couple of weeks off to savor the greatest victory of his nine-year career.

He has penciled in some time with his family in Hawaii and possibly visit San Diego.

He'll use the break to consider some revisions to his playing schedule. As the American national champion, he's assured of a spot on the U.S. Ryder Cup team that will play the best from Europe at Dublin, Ohio, this fall.

A's stop Sabes, Royals, 4-1

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — Steve Ontiveros, the former reliever who became an Oakland starter in May, pitched four-hit ball for seven innings to beat Bret Saberhagen as the Athletics defeated the Kansas City Royals 4-1 Monday night.

The A's snapped a six-game winning streak by Saberhagen, the major leagues' top winner at 12-2.

Ontiveros, 4-1, won his fourth consecutive game and Jay Howell pitched two innings, allowing no hits, for his 14th save. Ontiveros, used strictly in relief his first two seasons with the A's, had four strikeouts and walked two in his fourth major league start.

Saberhagen pitched 7 2-3 innings and allowed nine hits, striking out five and walking two. Dan Quisenberry came on and was greeted by Tony Phillips' two-run homer, his eighth, scoring Terry Steinbach who had singled.

The Royals scored an unearned run in the second inning and the A's came back with two runs in the bottom of the second.

Could you use money from Home next semester?

Whether you're starting out for college or finishing up a graduate degree, there's one tough subject you'll have to face next semester.

Tuition.

The good news is, Home State Bank can help you find the money for college. Because just last year, more than 1,000 students received their low interest loans from us.

So, if you have an intense desire for that college diploma, come to Home State Bank. We have just the loan program for you.

Under the Guaranteed Student Loan program, for example, you don't need collateral, a cosigner, or an established credit rating. First and second-year students can receive up to $2,625 a year. For third and fourth-year students, up to $4,000 a year. You make no payments until six months after graduation or after you become a part-time student.

If you're studying in the health professions, there's a special HEAL loan program. And this year, our HEAL interest rate is the lowest in the Kansas City area.

In addition, some students receive Supplemental Loans for Students (SLS), and parents of undergraduates can receive loans for college costs through the Parent Loans program.

To receive your student loan application, call Connie Holmes at 321-3333. Your application will be processed and mailed to the school of your choice within 10 days.

Now, isn't that a good reason to call Home?

Pickers, gridders, singers gather for park's annual blue grass day

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

Toe-tappin', foot-stompin', jammin' music brightened a rainy Saturday evening for spectators at the Flint Hills Bluegrass Day in City Park.

Norman and Nancy Blake of Colorado Springs, Colo., were the feature attraction of the evening on the Arts in the Park stage as they performed before about 1,400 people. The Blakes play traditional bluegrass music and have made several recordings in Nashville.

"It's interesting because Nancy Blake plays the violin, cello and guitar," said Mark Monroe, Manhattan. "He plays guitar and a little fiddle."

Throughout the afternoon, bluegrass bands performed and workshops were given in the pavilion, including one by Mark Selby of Eskridge.

"Mark is the most versatile musician I know," said Steve Hanson, owner of S.M. Hanson Music, 316 Poyntz Ave., and a sponsor of the annual event.

Selby played a mixture of ragtime, blues, classical, bluegrass and rock music. He has made two albums and will be doing a six-week tour in Europe in July.

Bluegrass Day was sponsored in conjunction with the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department and Arts in the Park.

In addition, the Monroe Bluegrass Band came for the afternoon. The group is actually composed of members of the Smoky Hill River Band.

"We're a country band, but some of us wanted to put this together for this Bluegrass Day," said Mark Monroe, band member.

Chris Biggs and Wheatland Express did some entertaining of their own at noon on the Courthouse Plaza and later at the pavilion in City Park.

"We chose local groups for area people to enjoy the area's musicians," Hanson said. "The local talent is having a good time sharing their hobby."

Bluegrass music is a mixture of folk music and over-drive, to paraphrase one folk-music historian. It originated in the British Isles and was part of the folk music that came to America. It is acoustic music — musicians use neither electrical nor percussion instruments.

"You've got to have a six-string steel guitar, a bass, banjo, mandolin and harmony vocals," Biggs said.

The addition of the five-string banjo sped up the tempo of bluegrass music for such groups as Bill Monroe and the Bluegrass Boys.

"The term 'bluegrass music' comes from the type of music Monroe played," Biggs said.

Playing in Monroe's background band during the '40s were Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs, who later formed their own bluegrass band.

"The fans of bluegrass music are like a cult," Biggs said. "They travel many miles, pay to get in and won't even listen to the groups on the stage."

Biggs was right. Many little groups were in the parking lot or gathered on the grass playing whatever instrument they had brought.

"One person plays and another sees if they know it and just tries to join in," said Jeff Brown, Galax, Va.

Galax is the site of the largest authentic bluegrass convention, Brown said. He was busy trying to follow the Irish tune one woman was picking on her mandolin.

Besides the free music at Bluegrass Day, visitors could attend workshops conducted between performances by the various

'Top hat' dancer dies while fighting illness

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Fred Astaire, who defined Hollywood elegance for 30 years dancing in top hat and tails with Ginger Rogers and other stars, died of pneumonia Monday in his wife's arms. He was 88.

Astaire died at Century City Hospital at 4:25 a.m., his wife, Robyn, tearfully told a jammed news conference.

"I just got in bed with him and put my arms around him and he died in my arms, and that's the way he wanted it," said Robyn, the former racehorse jockey whom he married in 1980. "He died holding onto me."

He had been admitted June 12 with a cold that worsened to pneumonia. President Reagan hailed Astaire as "an American legend."

"Fred was, in every sense of the word, a 'superstar,'" Reagan said in Melbourne, Fla. "...the ultimate dancer — the dancer who made it all look so easy."

Irving Berlin, many of whose songs Astaire introduced, recalled the dancer as "one of my oldest friends."

"He was an international star...the purest talent I have ever worked with," Berlin said.

Astaire's debonair style dominated the Hollywood musical genre beginning in the 1930s, when he starred in many song-and-dance films with Rogers.

"I don't think there's another one like him," said Rogers, who teamed up with Astaire in "Flying Down to Rio" in 1933 and followed with 10 other musical hits. "He'll always have my love and admiration."

Fellow song-and-dance man Gene Kelly said: "Although we have lost one of the greatest dancers who ever lived, Fred Astaire will always be immortal and an inspiration to all dancers who come after us."

Astaire and Rogers captivated depression-era audiences, and the magic continued with succeeding partners, including Cyd Charisse, Rita Hayworth, Judy Garland, Audrey Hepburn.

Ballet choreographer George Balanchine once called him "the greatest dancer in the world," and ballet star Mikhail Baryshnikov praised his "perfection."

But Astaire played down his own talent.

"I never thought a funny-looking guy like me would be suitable for pictures," Astaire once said, and a studio executive once dismissed him with the curt words: "Can't act...can't sing...balding...can dance a little."

Born Frederick Austerlitz on May 10, 1899, to an Omaha, Neb., beer salesman, he was enrolled by his mother in dancing school. She took him, with his older sister, Adele, to New York for professional training in 1906, and the youngsters soon were touring vaudeville under their new name, Astaire.

A Paramount executive who viewed Astaire's 1930 screen test dismissed him, but RKO signed him and loaned him to MGM for his debut with Joan Crawford in the 1933 "Dancing Lady."

After RKO's "Flying Down to Rio" with Rogers, the duo appeared in such hits as "The Gay Divorcee," "Roberta," "Top Hat," "Follow the Fleet," "Swing Time," "Shall We Dance," "Carefree" and "The Story of Vernon and Irene Castle."

The team parted in 1939 except for a 1949 reunion in "The Barkleys of Broadway."

Astaire continued in a string of successful musicals with various dance partners, including "Holiday Inn," "Easter Parade," "Royal Wedding," "Daddy Long Legs," "Funny Face" and "Silk Stockings." His only Oscar, in 1949, was honorary but he won nine Emmys for TV specials in the '50s and '60s.

Astaire's first wife, New York socialite Phyllis Baker Potter, died of cancer in 1954 after 21 years of marriage and two children — Fred Jr., born in 1936, and Ava, born in 1942. The family also included Peter Hoffer, Robyn's son from a previous marriage.

He remained vital and physically active long into his 80s. He broke his arm at 80 showing off on a skateboard for his grandchildren. On June 28, 1980, he married the 35-year-old Robyn.

'Creepshow II' brings laughs, but not always intentionally

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

"Creepshow II" has the same problem as most diet sodas: they're both missing way too much. As a black comedy it's supposed to be scary as well as funny, and it utterly fails in both departments.

Film Review

Great examples of black comedies can be found with "American Werewolf in London," "Fright Night" or with the recently released Vietnam-based "Hotel Hanoi." Many films aspire to be horror-oriented, such as "Friday the 13th." But usually because of fake special effects, improbable characters and situations and, worst of all, bad acting, they become laughable. This is precisely the issue with "Creepshow II."

As with the last one, it's a series of vignettes strung together with a ghoulish host and animated shorts. The first one is "Old Chief Woodenhead." This bore stars George Kennedy and Dorothy Lamour as two down-on-their-luck storekeepers who are put in charge of a tribe's sacred jewels. They're robbed by a group of dirty teens who end up killing the two and making off with the baubles.

The result, of course, is that the wooden Indian comes to life and goes on a one-warrior rampage — scalping and scaring the boys responsible for his storekeepers' deaths. The job of bringing the Indian to life is something worth seeing but the carnage he's responsible for is sloppy, unimaginative and anti-climactic.

"The Raft" is the second segment, and it's worse than the first. This time the focus is four dope-smoking, beer-guzzling teens (who are more deserving of misfortune) on their way to a rural pond for a summer dip.

After swimming out to a raft, a black, floating muck on the water corners them and threatens to devour their tender young bodies. One by one, each kid bites the dust since the slime is able to reach between the boards of the raft and suck the flesh off their bones.

The ending to the segment is not so much scary as it is cold-blooded, the last kid to survive could've qualified for a role in "Ruthless People."

True, the creature eating skin off these morons is pretty realistic, but it's unbalanced by their terrible acting. When one of them yells, "Hurry up, get out of the water," you'll swear you've heard more conviction when Vanna White shrieks "big money, big money." One good thing about films like this is that they give "Star Search" someplace to send their TV model-spokespersons.

The studio must have saved tons of money on special effects. All they used was a Hefty bag sprinkled with corn flakes. Oooo, so scary.

Finally, there's "The Hitch Hiker." It's about a well-to-do snob who's being terrorized on a stretch of highway by a bloody pedestrian she supposedly flattened a few miles back.

In an attempt to get rid of him, she runs over him again and again and again. She even shoots him a few times but someone, maybe the director, forgot to tell him to stay dead.

All the while she's mangling this corpse (and her Mercedes as well) he keeps talking to her and giving her a hard time.

One thing's for sure, "Thanks for the ride, Lady," is going to be the buzz-phrase of the summer.

Don't expect a grand, heart-stopping thriller; instead, accept it for what it truly is: a cheap, tired, mangy horror flick. The only reason it qualifies for a comedy is because audiences will laugh at it and not with it.

Home video benefits movie theater business

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Staying home in the air conditioning this summer and watching a good video-taped movie sounds like a cool idea to some.

Although many are opting for VCR entertainment, Bob Howard, manager of the Manhattan Commonwealth Theatres, said their popularity has not adversely affected the theater business.

"There are a lot of misconceptions about the effect of videos on the theater business," Howard said. "People see them as competition against movies, but they are really just an alternative source of entertainment."

Howard, who has been the manager since 1980, said he bases his opinion on 20 years of experience with Commonwealth Theatres.

"Videos have actually benefitted the theater industry," he said. "For one thing, they have enhanced the public's awareness of movies. There are more movie reviewers in the paper and on TV all the time. I've had people ask me about future movies that I haven't even heard about yet."

More interest in movies means the public takes quality more seriously, he said. Also, studios make money from the videos and can, in turn, use that money to make better movies.

The only real changes videos have caused involve the special types of movies, Howard said. They have virtually eliminated X-rated shows because it is easier to rent one for private viewing.

"The late-night gimmick movies and the 4-year-old films that only cost one dollar are all but gone, too," he said.

Although videos have been around for years, Howard said, they really came into their own in the last five years.

"Although peak theater season is summertime, attendance has not fallen off," he said. "In fact, this year was higher than last year."

Howard said in many ways, the theater is better than videos, and the public knows it.

"A movie like 'Top Gun' with all of its aerial photography would not be nearly as effective on a small TV screen," he said.

"I read in The Kansas City Star that going to a show is actually a form of commitment," Howard said. "You must leave the house. People enjoy things more when they are planned events. Who would take a girl out on a date to his own living room?"

Videos have do advantages, though. For a large family, it is more economical to rent a video machine and movie.

Also, since the bulk of good movies come out in June, many quality films get bumped aside by the competition, Howard said.

"Generally, the better a movie does at the box office, the longer the studio will wait to release it in video," he said. "But a less-productive movie, regardless of the quality, might still succeed more as a video."

Howard said studios have tried to space out the release of movies a little more to ease this problem.

Crisis volunteers listen, help through phone

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

Many people have heard of the FONE Crisis Center. Few, however, know what a volunteer can go through on an "average" night.

In the company of another FONE Crisis Center volunteer, Eunice settles back in a green vinyl chair to watch the "Tonight Show." As the program starts, the crisis line rings.

With the first ring, Eunice sits up and takes a moment to catch her breath and mentally prepare herself. After the customary second ring, Eunice picks up the receiver.

"The FONE. This is Eunice."

She hears only sobs.

Trying to be supportive to the caller, Eunice responds, "I'm here — can you tell me what's wrong? Can you talk to me about it?"

Finally, a woman answers. In between floods of tears, the woman tells Eunice she and her boyfriend have just broken up. They had been together for three years, and now she feels like her life is crumbling apart.

As the call continues, Eunice picks up on signals that indicate the caller might be suicidal. She hears the caller saying she just wants the pain to be over.

Through reflective listening, Eunice tells the caller what she's hearing. The caller admits she is suicidal.

"Have you done anything drastic?" Eunice says.

The caller tells Eunice she has taken a bottle of Extra Strength Tylenol. Hearing this, Eunice signals her FONE partner to contact the on-call support staff.

Eunice has kept the caller on the line and requested that she get the bottle and read her the contents.

Meanwhile, the counselor on call has arrived to aid Eunice.

Eunice tries to convince the caller that she needs medical assistance. The caller finally agrees and gives Eunice her address. Eunice asks her partner to call an ambulance.

Eunice continues to reassure the caller she has done the right thing. The caller begins to cry again. She feels ashamed of what she has done. Eunice comforts her.

The paramedics arrive at the caller's apartment and take the caller to the hospital.

After being on the phone for 57 minutes, Eunice hangs up the receiver and sinks back into her chair. She is shaking.

At a volunteer training session June 13, the four participants may have experienced a mock situation similar to the preceding fictitious account.

The FONE workshop was organized by Katie Andre, spring 1986 graduate from the College of Veterinary Medicine and FONE crisis center coordinator, and Charlene Nichols, junior in journalism and mass communications and assistant coordinator.

The training was based heavily in communications skills and reflective listening, Nichols said.

Reflective listening is hearing the emotion behind what is being said and reflecting that back to the speaker, Nichols said.

The main vehicle used to teach the communications and listening skills was small group role-playing.

"The trainees handle a mock problem. And we point out their great points and those areas we think they may want to work on," Nichols said.

The training program for volunteers is supplemented with information from the Gay and Lesbian Resource Center, the Crisis Center and additional information on drugs and alcohol. Representatives from these organizations are asked to speak when possible, she said.

"GLRC gives information about AIDS and gay and lesbian relationships. Advocates from the Crisis Center deal with rape, abuse and other important women's issues. Added information on drug and alcohol abuse is also included," Nichols said. "I think the training is as successful as we can make it with the limited people and time we have," she said. "The FONE hasn't lost anyone yet."

The FONE Crisis Center is staffed by two volunteers between the hours of 5 p.m. and 8 a.m. Newly trained volunteers are paired with experienced workers, Nichols said. As added backup, an on-call volunteer with additional training, is available. The faculty adviser for the FONE is a counseling professional, she said.

Nichols said anyone can work on the FONE crisis line. "It only takes common sense and the concern to be there."

The next FONE volunteer training session will be from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday in Union 213.

"Your mid-year evaluations will be prepared in approximately 1½ months," the memo noted. "You will be evaluated on your accomplishments or lack of accomplishments. Need I say more?"

"The IRS forbids use of enforcement statistics to rate the performance of its managers or employees," spokesman Johnelle Hunter said in response to the memo. "It is clear that the memo that is being used today is in violation of this. We feel the branch chief misunderstood the guidelines."

Dole

"There is more interest as a result of the presidential politics," Sovren said. "It's a way of saying we do care about the issue."

Cox noted that Dole is opposed to public financing of Senate campaigns, but rapidly switches gears when it comes to presidential politics. He said Dole has twice indicated he'll accept public funding for presidential campaigns, first in 1976 and then again last week.

Cox said Dole's role as a Republican leader is pivotal if the issue is to come up for a vote.

The report defines enhancement of facilities with highest priority as "computer support, audio-visual/slide collaboration, exhibition and critique space, Weigel Library, academic laboratories and non-academic support facilities."

But increased enrollment puts a strain on resources, Lapping said. Deciding where to allocate resources makes him "feel like the little Dutch boy not knowing which leak to plug," he said.

Budget problems will not mean stiffer requirements such as a minimum grade point average for acceptance in the college. Acceptance would not change because the college's philosophy focused more on outcome than entrance, Lapping said.

The renegotiation of the reciprocal agreement with the Missouri dental school would be "no big matter" because, the college was still "super-competitive pricewise" and students get a education because graduates of K-State's architecture program were "among the best architecture students in the United States," Lapping said.

while Phase Four is a second center north of Ackert Hall on Claflin Road at a cost of $75,000. According to the signage proposal, the centers' purposes will be to pass out free visitor parking permits, welcome visitors and provide information.

Beckom said the information centers were long-range proposals and he did not believe they would be completed by fall 1987.

For $89,000, Phase Three will include two additional campus identification signs made of limestone; two identification signs with engraved tan lettering on bronze-tone, heavy wood planking; five additional campus pedestrian information signs; and 11 directional signs for vehicular passengers.

Peltier

Soviet officials and the media in the Soviet Union have claimed Peltier, a leader of the American Indian Movement, is jailed on trumped-up charges and is being harassed because he is an Indian. They have said his case is an example of human rights violations in the United States.

Peltier was convicted in 1977 of killing two FBI agents during a gunfight two years earlier at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. He is serving two consecutive life terms.

musicians. Sessions were given about the hammered dulcimer, an introduction to banjo, finger-picking and flattop.

"Flattop is playing a guitar with a flat pick," Biggs said. "What they really mean, however, is playing fiddle tunes on a guitar."

Biggs' group, Wheatland Express, was formed only two years ago by the five members from the Manhattan-Junction City area.

"We started when we all got together for a jam session about two years ago," said Kevin Hendricks, the group's banjo player. "Not many people play (bluegrass) around here, so we thought it would be fun to start a group."

The other band members are Dave Michal, who plays rhythm and lead guitar; Al Bowyer, bass; and Jack Baker, mandolin.

"Most of us play more than one instrument," Biggs said. "We can switch around to cover for each other."

The group knows about three hours worth of music. Most of their selections are barbershop quartet style and written in five-part harmony, Biggs said.

Because the band members all hold full-time jobs, they like booking shows in the eastern part of Kansas for most weekends.

"We do it a lot more for the fun and peace of mind," Hendricks said. "In fact, we've done far more gigs for pig roasts and beer and personal satisfaction."

Hanson said he was pleased with the bluegrass festival and hopes to sponsor another and promote other live musical shows in the area as well.

"I hope that in the future there will even be informal jams of bluegrass music on a regular basis," he said.

Lobmeyer

Lobmeyer's death and Lichtenhan's error in judgment.

"The courts have always held that government institutions have no commitment to a specific individual," Johnson said. "As a police department, our responsibility is to the community as a whole, unless we have made a commitment to a specific individual, which in this case, we hadn't."

The actions of the police department are guided by statute law, whereas the cases Smith has been citing are civil law suits. Smith might be able to make a case if he can prove that having a 911 system makes the police obligated to specific individuals, since it is set up as an emergency line to render a fast response, Johnson said.

Putting it out

Manhattan Fire Department firefighters bring a garage fire under control at 1018 Laramie St. at about 9:30 Wednesday night. The building belonging to Rudy Wenger was apparently struck by lightning which started the blaze, according to eyewitness John Prevost, Manhattan. Damaged in the fire was a 1985 Chrysler Lebaron automobile, a 1972 Chevrolet truck and a Glastron boat. The storm caused minor damage around the city.

Costs force library to cut book orders

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

Farrell Library is undergoing a crisis. It is facing an increase of almost 61 percent in the cost of foreign serials, specifically scholarly journals.

"We can't maintain the publications that students and faculty require under current conditions," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

The crisis is the result of the decreasing value of the dollar overseas, he said. Farrell pays for each of its foreign serial subscriptions in the local currency. As the value of the dollar declines, that currency becomes more expensive.

"Consider the West German mark," Hobrock said. "One American dollar used to buy four marks. Now $1 buys one-half mark, so buying something from West Germany that used to cost $1 costs $8."

"In the past year, the average foreign currency has increased 20 percent against the dollar, but K-State's foreign subscription prices have increased almost 61 percent."

"What's going on is greed. Let's make a big buck out of devaluation," he said.

Farrell currently subscribes to 2,200 foreign serials at a cost of $485,033, said Diana Farmer, serials librarian. The average cost is now $217 a year for each foreign serial. In 1986, when the 1986-87 fiscal budget was proposed, the average cost was $135 a year.

The foreign serials are an integral part of a research library, Hobrock said.

"If the K-State library has to cancel important publications, such an action will result in faculty being unable to do research, and leaving," he said. "They'll go somewhere that can support their research."

Hobrock said 99 percent of all foreign titles come from Europe; however, most are written in English as the "international language of scholarship."

When this year's serials budget was being put together, the library expected inflation and planned for it, he said. But the increasing costs plus the continued dollar devaluation resulted in a shortfall of $183,188 in the foreign serials budget.

This shortfall has been compensated for in several ways. For example, the library overestimated the standing domestic serials budget by $80,000, said Charlene Grass, associate dean for technical and collection services. This money was used to close the gap.

Another way the library compensated for the shortfall was through a decrease in the number of new books. Farrell is purchasing 3,000 fewer books for fiscal 1987-88.

"Farrell will be processing 40,000 items this year, instead of the 43,000 items which would have been available (without the budget shortfall)," Hobrock said. "The unfortunate thing is that those books will be lost forever. They will never be added to our collection."

Hobrock said President Jon Wefald transferred funds to the library from other University equipment funding at the last minute to make up the rest of this year's shortfall.

"President Wefald gave the library $100,000 toward the problem for this year," Hobrock said. "The library will attempt to hold the line and maintain the status quo for this year, but next July we'll have to cancel serials."

International scientists study Konza Prairie

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

Scientists from the United States, Canada and Europe will be gathering in Manhattan next week to participate in the second phase of a multi-million dollar research project sponsored by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

The goal of the International Satellite Land Surface Climatology Project is to find how large, plant-covered regions such as the Konza Prairie Natural Area affect the weather, said Ghassem Asrar, assistant professor in agronomy and the project's mission manager.

This type of research site was chosen due to its extensive vegetation and proximity to a research institution, Asrar said.

"The goal of the research on the Konza Prairie is to try and link the biosphere (plants and animals) with the elements of the atmosphere to create a better understanding of how the two together affect our environment," Asrar said. "We are trying to understand the process, model it and apply the information to other climate zones and areas."

More than 75 scientists from the United States, France, Canada and England will be scattered across the 8,600-acre Konza Prairie, a research facility operated by the Division of Biology.

Current weather-forecasting models do not take into account the effect of the biosphere. The model being researched will hopefully change that, Asrar said.

Scientists will be gathering ground measurements during the second phase of the First ISLSCP Field Experiment beginning today through July 15. Their data, along with information collected from specially equipped aircraft, will be compared to information gathered by satellites and applied to the research project.

Several aircraft, such as a NASA helicopter, a King Air small airplane and a NASA C-130, will be involved in the research. Three satellites will also be used.

A major function of the NASA research project is to examine the use of remote sensing. This is a method of detection and measurement from far distances, Asrar said.

"It is like taking a photograph from far away," he said.

The research project will utilize satellite remote sensing "pictures" ranging from 40 yards to 10 miles per side to study the Konza Prairie, Asrar said.

These "pictures" give large amounts of information. Part of the NASA project is to apply new technologies to the interpretation of that information.

The FIFE project involves measuring the energy balance on the Konza Prairie. This is being accomplished by measuring the heat in the air and soil and the amount of evaporation from the soil and plants, Asrar said.

"Involved in the research are biologists, ecologists, plant pathologists, physicists, atmospheric scientists, remote sensing experts, soil experts, range management specialists and computer scientists," Asrar said.

The problem with such a large research project, "is to get these experts to work together and look beyond their expertise," he said.

The FIFE project has been divided into five research areas to best utilize the large number of specialists involved. They are the atmospheric boundary layer, surface fluxes, corrections and calibration, surface radiances and biology, and

Good conditions help area farmers finish summer wheat harvest early

By RHODA REIN
Collegian Reporter

From the capital to the western plains, the golden waves of wheat are being harvested earlier than normal in Kansas due to good growing conditions.

Tyson Hughes, a Wellington farmer, estimated that 80 percent of Summer County wheat fields have already been cut. Hughes said his family will be done harvesting this year's wheat by the time they had started last year.

"We are cutting earlier this year because of nice weather toward the end of the growing season. Warm, but not extremely hot, weather is good because it allows the heads to fill," Hughes said. "Fill is when the wheat grains turn from a mushy soft liquid to the desired hard grain."

However, the weather has not always been ideal for the Wellington area.

"The wet fall made planting difficult and the late spring freezes weren't exactly welcome either," Hughes said.

In addition, there were some losses due to recent hailstorms.

"Some places around Wellington experienced 50 percent losses from hailstorms last month," he said.

Dana Anderson, assistant in grain receiving at the Farmers Co-op Grain Association of Wellington, oversees wheat brought to the elevator.

"Local wheat brought in has tested at 58 pounds per bushel on the average," Anderson said. "This is somewhat lighter than last year's wheat and lighter than the 60 pounds per bushel considered average by the Farmers Co-op in Wellington."

A protein measurement is taken to determine the quality of the wheat. This measurement determines what type of wheat products the grain is suitable for producing.

Hughes said he is satisfied with the 11 percent protein content of his already harvested wheat, but added that hard rain last Wednesday night may lower the protein content of wheat yet to be harvested.

The substantial rainfall set the wheat capital's harvesting schedule back a few days.

Recent showers during the latter days of last week lowered the Scott County area average test weight and slowed harvest progress.

"The wheat is bleached, so we went from a 62-pound average to an average of 60 pounds per bushel," said Junior Strecker, general manager of the Scott Cooperative Association.

"This loss of two pounds in test weight means a loss of between 3 (percent) and 4 percent in yield of the overall crop," Strecker said.

The Scott County wheat harvest is taking place later than last year but still earlier than expected.

"Because of mild winter temperatures, the wheat came out of dormancy earlier," Strecker said.

The west has also had its share of hail damage. A recent hailstorm west of Scott City caused 25 percent to 100 percent losses in a narrow band across the Marienthal area.

As for the Flint Hills area, Potawatomi County wheat farmer Carrol Ubel finished cutting his 150 acres of wheat last Wednesday evening.

"My test weight averaged 61 pounds per bushel, which was higher than my test weight last year," Ubel said. "Last year's harvest was a wet harvest for me. This year's drier conditions have helped my yield."

Democrats battle governor on developing waste dump

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Democratic Reps. Kathleen Sebelius of Topeka and Delbert Gross of Hays said Wednesday Kansas should reject both proposals for building a nuclear waste dump in a five-state compact and start looking for a different developer than the two volunteers under consideration.

The lawmakers also hammered away at a recent major Democratic theme by calling for Gov. Mike Hayden to slow down the process of selecting a developer. They said lingering questions first must be answered regarding a flawed environmental study, states' liability for contamination caused by a dump, costs and basic rules of the compact.

"I'm terrifically concerned that the compact we're in is not working," Sebelius told a Statehouse news conference. "The radioactive waste disposal industry is in an evolutionary phase and current methods are not working. Sites around the country are leaking and contaminating groundwater and the environment."

"I believe we need to slow the process down and get answers to some questions. We need to grind the process to a halt and not hire a developer until we get answers to some important questions."

"The risk to our ecology and to the health of our families is far more important than any arbitrary financial penalties which might be imposed by the federal government."

Sebelius and Gross are concerned the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact Commission will select a developer at its meeting Monday in Oklahoma City, Okla.

Kathy Peterson, spokeswoman for the governor, said her boss is well aware of the issues being raised and long ago his task force began investigating a list of 50 questions related to the dump. She said answers are ready and will be released Thursday. She also rejected the idea of delaying a decision on the developer.

"The Democrats say we shouldn't vote on the developer," Peterson said. "The other four states are ready to go. It would be irresponsible for us not to vote, too. We'd be letting them dictate public policy with no input from Kansas."

She said delaying the vote or rejecting both developers would be a waste of time because there just aren't any other companies interested in building a waste dump in Kansas.

They said Hayden should demand the compact commission delay the decision pending resolution of a list of key questions, such as making a final determination of the status of an environmental study commissioned to locate potential sites within the five compact states — Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana.

"The compact is poised to choose between two developers, neither of which has a good track record nor

INTERNATIONAL Soviets to review Gorbachev's plan

MOSCOW — General Secretary Mikhail S. Gorbachev this week takes his blueprint for economic reform to a meeting of the Communist Party leadership, where resistance and even opposition to the project have been rumored.

A plenum of the party's Central Committee, expected to begin Thursday or Friday, will debate proposals to reverse more than six decades of central control over the vast state-run economy.

The plan for reforming the nation's economic management is viewed as key to Gorbachev's efforts to stimulate productivity, cut red tape, foster innovation and free managers and workers from some of the strictures of centralized bureaucracy.

But high-level resistance and even overt opposition to the plan have been widely rumored. The last Central Committee meeting, in January, failed to endorse some of the Communist Party general secretary's proposals for altering the one-candidate system of national and party elections.

NATIONAL Training accident kills Guardsman

FORT HOOD, Texas — A National Guardsman was killed when an M-60 tank exploded after it was hit by a shell fired by another tank, the 11th death in two days during training maneuvers, officials said Wednesday.

Seven others were injured in the night maneuvers accident late Tuesday, a day after a military helicopter skimming over treetops crashed in a clearing and killed all 10 reservists and National Guardsmen aboard.

Both mishaps occurred during the two-week Starburst '87 training maneuvers at 339-square-mile Fort Hood in central Texas. About 13,000 Texas National Guard soldiers and 5,000 Army Reserve support unit members are involved in the maneuvers.

Tuesday's accident occurred "during a training accident with an M-60 tank when an M-60 tank fired upon a second M-60 tank," said Fort Hood spokesman Sgt. Roger Allen.

Gleason, 71, dies after cancer fight

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — Jackie Gleason, the rotund "Great One" who got laughs and riches as a blustering bus driver in "The Honeymooners" and an Academy Award nomination as a pool shark in "The Hustler," died Wednesday night of cancer. He was 71.

Gleason, creator of the Poor Soul, Reggie van Gleason III and Joe the Bartender, was one of television's biggest draws in the 1950s. When bus driver Ralph Kramden turned to his wife, shaking his fist and threatening, "One of these days, Alice," millions of viewers shouted along.

In later years, his recurring role as Sheriff Buford T. Justice in the "Smokey and the Bandit" movies won over a new generation.

His Falstaffian capacity for enjoying life was reflected in his two trademark lines: "How sweet it is!" and "And away we go!"

He drove himself hard on the set — he once broke a leg on the air — and played hard off it. His drinking and eating habits became the stuff of legend. Producer David Susskind once said Gleason could "put away more scotch per square hour than any man alive," and Gleason's weight at one point ballooned to more than 280 pounds.

"You only live once," Gleason would say. "Let's live it up."

REGIONAL Inmate convicted in AIDS bite case

MINNEAPOLIS — A prison inmate who bit two guards after testing positive for AIDS was found guilty Wednesday of two counts of assault with a deadly and dangerous weapon — his mouth and teeth.

The jury found James V. Moore, 44, of New York City, guilty after deliberating three hours.

Moore was accused of biting guards Timothy Voigt and Ronald McCullough at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., in January.

During the trial, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jon Hopeman said Moore told a nurse after the incident that he wanted the guards to die and hoped they would get AIDS from the wounds.

"Almost any object which is likely to produce death or great bodily harm can, in certain circumstances, be a dangerous weapon," Hopeman told the jurors in closing arguments.

Hopeman said it is known that AIDS can be transmitted by blood or other body fluids, but it's not known if it can be transmitted through saliva.

The maximum sentence for assault with a deadly weapon is 10 years. U.S. District Judge Diana Murphy ordered a presentence investigation and no sentencing date was set.

Stephan: Rotary to admit women

TOPEKA — Rotary Clubs in Kansas may no longer exclude women from their membership, Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Wednesday in a legal opinion.

Stephan based his opinion on a U.S. Supreme Court decision handed down last month on the Rotary Club issue.

He said Kansas laws which protect against discrimination apply to Rotary Clubs because they are business-oriented rather than non-profit fraternal or social associations, which are exempt from the anti-discrimination laws.

The case before the Supreme Court stemmed from a challenge by the Duarte Rotary Club of California. The courts in California decided the clubs were "business establishments" and thus subject to civil rights laws protecting against discrimination.

"In determining whether the Rotary Club of Duarte was private or public in nature, the U.S. Supreme Court considered factors such as size, purpose, selectivity and whether non-members are excluded from critical aspects of the relationship," Stephan said in his seven-page opinion.

He said the court ruled the Rotary Clubs are not an "association or corporation which are organized for social or fraternal purposes, but rather for business purposes."

Religious groups seek to ban band

WICHITA — After hearing two hours of arguments from rock 'n' roll advocates and religious groups Wednesday, the Sedgewick County Commission barred the heavy-metal band Motley Crue from playing at the county-owned Kansas Coliseum.

A short time later, Commission Chairman Tom Scott had second thoughts and called for a special commission meeting Friday to reconsider the contract. In the past, the commission twice has allowed Motley Crue to perform at the 12,000-seat facility.

The commission banned the group by failing to act on a contract that would have allowed Motley Crue to perform July 10 in the coliseum.

Church groups hailed the decision as their first victory in a 20-month battle with the county government to restrict heavy-metal bands and other rock groups they consider obscene.

A rock 'n' roll group criticized the decision, saying heavy-metal music lovers have a constitutional right to listen to the concerts.

Dave Bayouth, the sole commissioner who sought to allow the Motley Crue concert, warned that the county could face a lawsuit from the rock group's promoters, who have already sold 3,000 to 4,000 tickets at $15 each.

Positions combine; Krause takes over

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

The University has decided to phase out the position of vice president of educational and student services, a position left open with the June 10 announcement of William Sutton's retirement.

Robert S. Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, has been appointed as the University's chief student affairs officer.

President Jon Wefald said the decision to eliminate the vice president's position, announced Wednesday, was made to streamline the student services offices on campus.

"We want to put them in one functional unit," he said. "It enables us to consolidate our administrative organization."

Wefald said the decision came as a result of Sutton's resignation.

"With Dr. Sutton's decision to return to the biology department, we saw it as a good opportunity to phase out the position," he said.

Sutton said he has been out of town for the past three days and has not been given current information.

"The president is reorganizing the division. I was aware there would be some changes, but I don't know any of the details," Sutton said.

Wefald said the reason for the administrative realignment is to offer the students one area of contact from the time they are recruited to the time they become alumni. Details of the change in structure will be determined over the next few weeks.

Krause said he sees the consolidation of duties as a good opportunity to coordinate student services programs.

"I want to follow up on the concept of coordinating programs to limit duplication while adding strength," Krause said. "Students need to know what they can expect to receive in the way of services which can help them achieve their educational goals."

No specific structural changes have been planned at this time, Krause said. He said he doesn't visualize any radical changes being made within at least the next six months.

"Our goal now is to be ready to open shop in the fall," Krause said. "The continuing issues will be dealt with later."

Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, Michael Lynch, director of academic assistance and Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president, will be working with Krause to determine the course of the realignment. Lynch said the change should increase efficiency.

"The primary focus will be on student recruitment and retention and the role student services plays in that area," Lynch said.

Human Ecology finds ways to cooperate with industries

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This is the third in a nine-part series dealing with the five-year strategic plan for the University's colleges.

The strategic long-range plan for the College of Human Ecology emphasizes the need to prepare students for America's service and information-oriented society.

"Businesses and industries want employees who are sensitive to people's likes as well as what is good for them," said Barbara Stowe, dean of the college.

Human Ecology graduates who understand this relationship can design goods and services that will be successful in the marketplace, she said.

"The five-year plan tells how we are organized to meet the needs of students and the community with instructional, research and extension programs," Stowe said.

The hotel and restaurant management program was identified as the largest area for future growth and expansion in the college as far as staff support, operating expenses and equipment, she said.

Stowe said she anticipates higher enrollment in the program through its enhancement. The revenue generated by the increased enrollment should stabilize the college in the future.

"K-State has the only four-year program related to hospitality approved by the Kansas Board of Regents," the strategic planning report said. "The hospitality program is expected to quadruple undergraduate enrollment in the next five years."

An additional four faculty and one re-allocated position in hotel and restaurant management are proposed in the plan to meet the increased number of students.

The five-year plan sharpens the focus of the college by dropping six degree programs and eight specializations. It also projects enrollment figures for 1989 through

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

1991 and calculates the resulting number of additional student hours.

"A conservative estimate is that with this focus, our programs will generate $680,000 in the next five years," Stowe said.

Other programs are being studied for enhancement in accordance with the trend toward economic development in Kansas.

"We expect to apply for funds from the state lottery and parimutual that are going toward economic development programs," Stowe said.

The Department of Food Science and Human Nutrition is suited for research in the value-added concept for agricultural and food products. Processing Kansas agricultural products in the state rather than shipping them out of state enhances the Kansas economy.

"We already have some strong research as a basis toward that end," Stowe said.

Cheap, but Effective

The work has begun essentially with a project that tests alternative sweeteners in baked goods. The college's proposal includes development of these chemically-related food products along with the Department of Chemical Engineering in the College of Engineering and Food Science in the College of Agriculture.

The plan outlines one degree merger. The Department of Human Development and Family Studies is to merge with social work in the College of Arts and Sciences. A dual degree, consisting of almost 150 hours, already exists. The merger would condense the curriculum to 126 hours.

"We have departments that specialize in child development, marriage and family therapy and gerontology," Stowe said. "We have faculty with strong backgrounds in all stages of the lifespan."

A review of the past three years showed the college had lost funding. Human Ecology showed more than $320,000 in total reductions, including a loss of 7.5 faculty positions over the past three years.

"Our request to the Board of Regents for program development funds is in support of hotel and restaurant management," Stowe said. "The amount is less than half of what is projected to fully develop the hospitality program in five years."

Soviet eye doctors examine Peltier in U.S. Penitentiary

By The Associated Press

LEAVENWORTH — Two Soviet eye doctors who examined Leonard Peltier at the U.S. Penitentiary Wednesday recommended that the former American Indian Movement leader be treated with drugs they said are currently available only in the Soviet Union.

They said the drugs would not improve the blurred vision in his left eye but could prevent it from becoming worse.

The Soviets, ophthalmologists Eduard Avetisov and Lev Katselson, spent about 2½ hours at the prison. They saw Peltier in the prison hospital and also toured the prison with warden Jerry O'Brien, said Jeff Duncan, the warden's executive assistant.

They left Leavenworth without any public comment, but Peltier was brought to meet reporters in the visiting area at the prison and said they gave him encouragement about eye problems which he said have troubled him since November.

"I've been fighting eight months to get some treatment," said Peltier, 42, who is serving consecutive life terms for the deaths of two FBI agents at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota in 1975. "It took the Soviet Union to put some pressure on it."

However, the Soviets held a news conference later at a hotel in Kansas City, Mo., and had no criticism of Peltier's treatment by American doctors.

Avetisov said through an interpreter that a thrombosis or clot in a vein of the left eye resulted in "a great loss of vision."

"The same grave forecast for the right eye would not be justified," he said.

He said he and Katselson brought with them two drugs which they said were developed in the Soviet Union and so far are available only there. He said both are analogs of emocipin, with one to be given by injection in the eye and the other taken orally.

He said the focus of the recommended treatment is to keep the left eye from getting any worse and to prevent any additional clotting.

Asked if the American doctors had specifically agreed to use the drugs, Avetisov said, "If it is justified by all other considerations."

He said the Soviets brought enough of the two drugs for a two-month course of treatment.

Peltier's case has been much publicized in the Soviet Union, where officials cite it as an example of U.S. political repression to counter complaints about political prisoners in their own country.

When members of a U.S. congressional delegation visited Moscow last April and asked that some Soviet citizens be allowed to come to this country for medical treatment, Soviet officials responding by asking that Peltier be allowed to go to Moscow.

"By this demonstration of human rights concern, the Soviet government has let the U.S. know that in their country I am considered a political prisoner," Peltier said Wednesday.

Avetisov, president of the Ophthalmological Society in his country, said the visit was made for professional and humanitarian reasons.

"There were no political reasons," he said, but added, "We think that Mr. Peltier is one of the leaders of the American Indian Movement in this country. We think it would be worthwhile to reconsider the trial of Mr. Peltier."

THE FONE'S CRISIS

The Fone Crisis Center is an agency dedicated to helping people through their tough times; sometimes, this means suicide intervention. To do this, we need volunteers.

Hidden prejudices necessitate concern

After 21 years in and around Kansas, one truism I've come to accept about life in this state is, that it is difficult to get people to talk seriously about racism. You mention the word, someone says, "Yeah, isn't the Klan a disgrace!" and that pretty well ends the discussion.

Of course the Klan is a disgrace. But what's more important than restating the obvious is developing a willingness to re-examine one's own attitudes toward other peoples. In my opinion, the failure to do this has done more to perpetuate racism in this state, and probably in this country, than has any amount of support the Klan might be able to gather.

Equally important, is developing a willingness to put new meaning into the phrase, "Question authority." By this I mean questioning the so-called experts — public officials, journalists, professors, administrators, etc. — when these experts begin to speak in subtle, yet discernably racist tones.

As an example, I offer my critique of a column by one of the foremost shapers of public opinion in this country. The column appeared in the April 20 issue of The Kansas City Times and was written by the respected author, television commentator, professor of political science and 74th Landon Lecturer George F. Will.

The column concerns a proposal by Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres to convene an international peace conference including various Middle Eastern nations, Palestinian representatives and the United Nations Security Council. Will argues against the proposal on the ground that it will not produce peace in the Middle East. My concern here, however, is not what Will argues, but how he argues it. To support his thesis, Will claims the multitude of Arab states at the conference would complicate negotiations.

Will refers frequently to the "Arab-Israeli conflicts" (a term also heard frequently from the major media), rather than speaking of individual relations between the 22 autonomous and diverse Arab states and the state of Israel. If the conflicts Will refers to are racial conflicts, which they are not, then we would expect him to write of Arab-Jewish conflicts.

On the other hand, if he refers to conflicts between nation states (and in the Palestinians' case, a people without a nation-state) we would expect to read of Palestinian-Israeli conflicts or maybe Syrian-Israeli conflicts. But strangely enough, such terms are apparently not part of Will's usually extensive vocabulary. The underlying assumption seems to be that Arabs, regardless of the differences in the political systems they inhabit, can be lumped into one political entity, "the Arabs."

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian
Columnist

Will continues, "The tone and parameters of negotiations in any international conference would be set by the most intransigent party at the table. Given the dynamics of Arab politics, there would be spirited competition for the intransigence trophy." Again, we might ask why Will writes of "Arab politics" rather than Jordanian politics, Syrian politics or Palestinian politics.

We might also ask why Will deems it unnecessary to mention some of the more "intransigent" aspects of Israeli politics. (Note Israeli, not Jewish.) If Will were to gloss over the brutal Israeli occupation of Palestine, the gross human rights violations during the 1982 invasion of Lebanon, the unjust approprition of land and the generally apartheid-like policies toward the Palestinians, that would be one thing. Instead, he chooses to ignore them altogether.

To make his point, Will relies on a general ignorance in this country of Arab peoples and the often racist assumptions which that ignorance implies. In fact, Will not only relies on this ignorance, but actively takes part in it. To "prove" the Arab states are too belligerent to get along with one another, Will points to the Iran-Iraq war which "has killed — so far — at least 30,000, six times the number of lives lost on all sides in all the 39 years of the Arab-Israeli conflicts."

Will's example raises a problem, however. While Iraq is certainly an Arab state, Iran, which is a Persian state with a distinct cultural, ethnic and linguistic identity, is certainly not. To lump nations as diverse as Jordan, Syria and Morocco into one political entity is a gross oversimplification; to put Iran into that same entity is simply wrong. The question becomes whether Will recognizes this important distinction.

If he does not, then we might question his credibility as a professor of political science.

If he does, and thus intentionally misleads his readers by implying that Iran is an Arab state, then we might question his credibility as a journalist. But the Iran-Iraq war aside, Will implies that because of a common racial identity, the 22 Arab states should have peaceful relations. He writes, "Intra-Arab conflicts have killed probably 20 times more people than Arab-Israeli conflicts."

While that may be true, what Will does not mention is that while Britons, French and Germans are all descendants of Germanic tribes, conflicts between those three nations have probably killed more people in this century than have the last 10 centuries of Arab-Jewish and Intra-Arab conflicts combined. However, Will does not make a habit of describing European politics as "intransigent."

I could continue, but I think by now the reader has caught my drift. What is important at this point, however, is not to call Will a racist. What is important is for each person, myself and Will included, to begin questioning his or her own attitudes as well as the attitudes of our leaders and public opinion shapers.

Ruling on creationism preserves basic rights

Separation of church and state is a cornerstone of the Bill of Rights. The Supreme Court ruling against the Louisiana Balanced Treatment of Creation-Science and Evolution-Science Act preserves this cornerstone.

On Friday, the court ruled 7-2 that it is unconstitutional for states to require public schools to teach creationism along with evolution. If faculty members wish to teach creationism, they may, but according to the ruling, now they are not forced.

Justice Antonin Scalia, speaking for dissenters William H. Rehnquist and himself, said the court should abandon investigating the "purpose" of a law in determining constitutionality with regard to separation of church and state. Does he realize he is contradicting the Supreme Court's purpose? Too bad he cannot come up with a better excuse than that.

Creationism states that the earth and life forms were zapped into existence 6,000 years ago. This theory was made to comply with a literal interpretation of one of the creation stories in the Book of Genesis. Creationism is not based upon scientific evidence; rather, it is founded upon biblical scholars' fundamental interpretations of the Bible.

Evolution, however, states that the earth came into existence billions of years ago and life as we know it evolved over millions of years. This theory is based on scientific research such as astronomical findings and fossils. The only reason it is controversial is because it contradicts the Bible.

Justice William J. Brennan, speaking for the majority, said creationism's purpose is "of discrediting evolution by counterbalancing its teaching at every turn with teaching of creation science."

Creationists argue that evolution is a religious theory of humanism, but the "humanists" are not a system built around a god and organized into a political sect. There is no humanist church.

Because they were persecuted for their religion, early settlers immigrated to America to practice their beliefs without fear. Later, more immigrants came to this country to have religious freedom ensured by the First Amendment. In the United States, we are free to practice any religion we choose or, if we choose, we may not practice any religion at all.

Creationism could be taught as literature or as a religious belief without forcing the state to take any religious view. However, if the state requires teaching creationism as a science in public schools, it advocates a certain religious viewpoint and threatens this freedom of religion which Americans so highly prize.

Religion is a highly personal matter. The government should not take a role in imposing any certain viewpoint, whether it is fundamentalism or atheism. With the Supreme Court ruling, church and state are still separate. And this separation ensures every American freedom from persecution because of his or her religious practices.

Unequal treatment

Editor,

"Moslem women dress modestly, not showing the body, because we (Moslems) do not see women as sex symbols; we see them as human beings." — Abdul-Ghani Mohammad (1987 Royal Purple, Page 436)

If one considers the above statement at face value, it seems a perfectly harmless one. But let us look at it more deeply.

It is important to consider whether the Moslem women dress modestly of their own free will, or whether they are forced to do so by the ever-dominating male — father, husband or Moslem religious leader (who, by the way, is always male). For instance, all the women in a country like Iran don the veil due to fear of punishment by the law; and again, the laws were enacted by males.

What beautiful sentiments are expressed in the latter half of Mohammad's statement. Considering women as human beings instead of considering them as sex symbols implies that Moslem males view women as equal to men. But if the world could simply change by statements or slogans it would have been a much better place to live long ago.

But people do not practice what they preach. I will grant that, in the case of the fanatic Moslem, he (and note the emphasis on the gender) practices what he preaches.

He preaches that woman should wear the veil. And he sees to it that she does. He preaches that women are not to be allowed in mosques, and he does not allow them in. He preaches that men are allowed to marry four wives (which was justified 1,400 years ago in the Middle East because the female-to-male ratio then was much more than 2-to-1). He preaches that the priest is to be a male, and so this is the case!

The point I am trying to make is clear. Given the above facts, does the Moslem man, as Mohammad has claimed, consider the Moslem woman as a human being? The answer is obviously "No."

I suggest that Moslem men go back and look at the original teachings of the Koran. Consider them and interpret them in the current context. Do not blindly follow customs followed 1,400 years ago. If any of these Moslem men can show me here where the Koran ordains that women are to be victimized, then it would seem to me that the Koran is not worthy of being considered the Word of God.

Advancing an enquiring mind

Each semester we, as students, are asked to purchase a monumental stack of textbooks for our classes. Ferociously, we storm the Union Book Store or Varney's, grabbing text after text and then quietly writing a death certificate for our checking accounts. This is how the system works.

Then, after spending a small fortune on texts, our instructors nonchalantly inform us that we must subscribe to a secondary reading source. Maybe it's Newsweek or perhaps The Wall Street Journal, but in either case it's a hassle we certainly don't need.

So I'm trying to change all that. What today's student needs is a cheap, informative, broad-in-scope news source that can satisfy a student budget as well as an instructor's requirements. With this in mind I set out to find the answer. I applied for a research grant and subsequently received a small block of funds — $5 to be precise. And with this financial backing safely secured, I eagerly lost myself in my work.

The sources I was searching for had to fit three criteria. They had to be: 1) Low in cost, 2) Wide in scope, and 3) Accurate.

This research was not easy to do, especially on a budget of only $5 — what with the need for supplies, equipment, clerical staff and a well-organized administrator. So, for the sake of economy, I did everything myself.

And what were the results of this strenuous research, you ask? I found the most inexpensive, concise, all-inclusive secondary reading source for today's college student to be the newsstand tabloids. Yes that's right, tabloids.

Perhaps the biggest advantage tabloids have is their cost efficiency. They are dirt cheap. I purchased five tabloids for my research — The Sun, The National Examiner, The Globe, The Star and The National Enquirer — and managed to come in well under budget ($1.65 remained to cover clerical and administrative expenses). Similar savings will await all students who make use of my findings.

GARY LEFFLER
Collegian
Columnist

However, an inexpensive price should not imply shoddy quality. In fact, it's quite the contrary. The Globe and The Star, for instance, are teeming with brightly colored photographs, something The Wall Street Journal has seen fit to deprive us of.

The scope of tabloids is broader than any student could possibly require. For one, low price tabloids offer coverage of religion, politics, archaeology, scientific phenomena, social trends, human nature, self-help discoveries and current events.

For example, within the tabloids I sampled there were precise, in-depth articles on Jim and Tammy Bakker, exorcisms in the Vatican, prop plane invasions of Red Square and an expose on foreign envoys and their freedom to steal, smuggle, murder and even break the speed limit while under the protection of diplomatic immunity. Newsweek simply cannot compete.

The process of mummification and past mysteries surrounding mummies were succinctly discussed in one tabloid while nearly all the publications touched on other highly scientific topics such as anatomy quirks (man with two stomachs eats 30 pounds of food daily), disease cures (cucumber diet prevents cancer) and, of course, alternative life forms (space aliens spend vacation with elderly deaf couple).

But wait! That's not all. For no additional cost you receive enlightening articles on love and marriage (59-year-old bag lady marries bag boy, 17), dietary tips and advice (man grows gills on tuna-only diet), more on love and marriage (wife imprisons hubby in bathroom to prevent divorce) and current working trends (begging for fun and profit).

I must, however, in good conscience, point out that not every tabloid fits every student's needs. There is a certain correlation between types of students and types of tabloids. How great this correlation remains unknown — I ran out of funding before I could gain access to a University computer.

Nonetheless, my personal observations suggest that theology majors, in particular, will benefit from reading The Globe for its articles on possession, The Bakkers, and a priest's love affair.

Pre-med students will gain insight via The National Examiner on the power of flowers to cure arthritis, mummification and do-it-yourself face lifts. Sociology majors will also find gripping commentary on motherhood and why a certain mom chose to flush her baby, instead of his diapers, down the toilet.

The National Enquirer is the key tabloid for restaurant management majors with its exposes on the true size of the Big Mac. Refreshing and delightful book excerpts are a must-read for English majors who truly appreciate fine American literature.

Close encounters of the most incredulous kind make The Sun the perfect supplemental reading for all life sciences and astrology majors. Creative writing students will also find this tabloid sensational.

Of course, if you are majoring in any type of performing arts degree then you simply must read all the tabloids. Keeping up on your peers and what others in your industry are doing is a basic requirement for success. After all, it's not who you know that counts but rather how much you know about them and what you can do with that information.

So, after all of this, I hope it's perfectly clear what we should do when our instructors assign secondary readings. Reach for our tabloids. They're cheap, wide-in-scope and...accurate? Accuracy was one of the criteria, wasn't it?

Oh well, maybe next time I'll get a grant of $7.50.

Service challenges harvest problems

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Every year, many countries experience post-harvest grain problems like inadequate grain storage and transport, insect infestation and high moisture content.

But many have overcome them with the help of the Post-Harvest Documentation Service in Farrell Library, said Donna Schenck-Hamlin, coordinator of the service.

PHDS has three components, Schenck-Hamlin said. First, it contains a special collection of agricultural literature pertaining to post-harvest or post-production agricultural problems involving cereal grains and legumes.

Second, it has a data base located in the Academic Computings facility of Cardwell Hall. This service is available to other countries who need help solving post-harvest problems. Finally, it has a direct air-mail document delivery system to countries with post-harvest problems.

Schenck-Hamlin said PHDS is part of the Food and Feed Grains Institute and serves more than 700 individuals and institutions. Members of the Peace Corps and larger groups, such as the Pakistan Agricultural Research Council, are recipients.

In 1975, the United Nations established a goal to reduce losses in post-harvest by 50 percent in a 10-year plan. Schenck-Hamlin said during the mid-70s, there was a concern, despite worldwide increases in production, because of continuing starvation.

"Reasons for hunger vary," she said. "Some causes are poor storage, poor transport, inadequate marketing facilities, insect infestation and high levels of moisture content."

Schenck-Hamlin said many countries lacked a central reference source amid a wealth of agricultural literature.

K-State established the first grain science department in the country, and it is still the only program awarding bachelor's, master's and doctoral degrees. The Agency for International Development, the foreign aid arm of the U.S. State Department, selected the University as a central subdivision, she said.

The service began functioning in 1979 in all commodities, but the load was too much to handle, Schenck-Hamlin said.

About two years later, a subdivision was created in Moscow, Idaho, for perishable commodities.

"Moscow is now our sister institute," she said.

PHDS is basically the same as a library service. Schenck-Hamlin said her job consists of finding appropriate documents cited in sources, skimming the abstracts, and then writing another abstract for the data base.

A staff of three or four student assistants enters data, retrieves information and telephones authors to request copies of their articles. Another student handles the client services and mailing.

"Developing countries have free access to the data base, and countries such as the United States or (those in) Europe who do not receive U.S. aid pay a minimal handling fee for computer searches," Schenck-Hamlin said.

"The faculty in the Food and Feed Grains Institute travels around the world giving technical assistance to developing countries, and in the process, they solicit subscribers to PHDS," she said. "Members then participate in an open-ended, ongoing receipt of a quarterly acquisitions list, basically a mail-order catalog of acquired documents."

Schenck-Hamlin said PHDS encompasses several areas: agricultural economics, agricultural engineering, grain sciences and stored product entomology.

"Sample documents might include testing grain for optimum moisture content," she said.

Another subject would be developing an insect trap for research and prevention of infestation. Safe use of pesticides or pesticide alternatives, solar grain drying and the development of national import/export policies are other examples.

Next month, Schenck-Hamlin plans to give a presentation in Guatemala City, Guatemala, at the annual meeting of Inter-American Agricultural Librarians. She said she hopes to develop contacts at the meeting for cooperative exchanges of literature between librarians of Latin America and K-State. Those at K-State are involved in similar ongoing projects, she said.

Another project has been underway for four years, she said. PHDS is in the process of helping to create a Post-Harvest Information Service at the National Agriculture Research Center in Islamabad, the capital city of Pakistan.

"This will be a national version of K-State's international resource center, and hopefully it will become larger," Schenck-Hamlin said.

K-State will provide the technical assistance.

"We'll have to train a documentation officer and a microforms person," she said. "The data base equipment has already been purchased with grant money from the AID, and we will bring the two trainees back from there in the coming year."

Science fiction film urges conservation

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

"Star Wars," the "Star Trek" movies and "2010: The Odyssey Continues." Movies such as these have created an image of space battles and daring adventure for contemporary science fiction movies. "Silent Running," a space film which played Monday and Tuesday nights in Union Forum Hall, was indeed sci-fi, but not in the contemporary sense.

Film Review

"Silent Running," filmed in 1972, is set in the year 2008. It is the story of one man's fight to save the last living botanical species. Freeman Lowell, played by Bruce Dern, discovered he must compromise many of his previous standards to do what he believed was right.

The scene is the Valley Forge, an American Airlines space freighter. Valley Forge is just one ship in a fleet of forest ships. Each ship is covered with attached domes, all of which contain one complete forest. The ships have been floating through space for eight years, awaiting the order to return home to begin reforesting Earth.

Lowell is the caretaker of the forests aboard the Valley Forge. His three shipmates are typical representatives of their era. In other words, they can't understand what makes the forest so important. While Lowell collects fresh fruits and vegetables from his gardens for food, his shipmates eat the meals processed by the ship. They can't understand why anyone would want to eat something that came from dirt.

The ax falls when Lowell's dream is destroyed — the fleet receives the order to "nuclear detonate" the forests and return the ships to commercial service. His shipmates are delighted and set about their task. A crisis is reached when Lowell realizes he can't stand to see one more forest destroyed in the name of progress.

The movie is obviously a product of its generation. 1972 was a time when the fight to maintain the Earth's conservation balance was getting into full swing. Director Douglas Trumbull created a future where no one is concerned with flowers, trees, animals or birds.

The message is clear. In order to preserve life, specifically life in the forests, we must be willing to make personal sacrifices. The forests must be saved, or something infinitely valuable, which can never be replaced, will be lost.

However, the flaw in "Silent Running" is the extent to which Trumbull went to get his point across. Rather than trying to rationally explain to his shipmates the forest's importance or helping them understand its beauty, Lowell appeared to be a conservationist freak. The points he made are logical, but not appealing enough to convince those surrounding him to join his fight.

The viewer is also left with the feeling that Lowell has somehow missed the point. He kills his shipmates to prevent them from destroying the last forest on the ship, and then reprograms the worker droids aboard to help him take care of it. Consequently, when Lowell also dies, the only things left are a barren ship with two droids and one enclosed forest.

The question is which is more valuable — human life or plant and animal life? If human life is more important, then why was Lowell willing to make the ultimate sacrifice so that one forest could live on, even though no human being would ever appreciate it again? If the lives of plants or animals are more important, which seems to be the message of the film, why then should one final forest be doomed to traverse through space for all eternity? Why should the forest not be allowed the "dignity" of dying?

The film did have many good points. The photography at the beginning was delicate and descriptive and continued to be well done throughout. Dern's performance at no time was at fault, as the audience was never tempted to disbelieve his actions and quirks. Any fault with Dern's character lay with the director, who may have made mistakes in judgment in determining the way Lowell should be portrayed.

Nonetheless, the movie is worth seeing, if for no other reason than a chance to develop the imagination in another direction than the usual space-flight fantasy.

Speech class offers unique opportunity

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

In addition to the regular crowd of University students, the Division of Continuing Education summer workshop on forensics has brought a multitude of high school students to campus.

This is the sixth year K-State has hosted a forensics workshop, said Lynne Ross, director of forensics. Thirty-six students and forensics coaches are attending.

The K-State workshop is special for two reasons, said Harold Nichols, head of the Department of Speech.

"There is no other workshop like this anywhere in this region, and last year we discovered it may be unique anywhere in the country," Nichols said. "Last year we had students attend from California and Texas, and we had a teacher come from Wyoming."

Ross said while many schools offer workshops in debate, which is team argumentation, the K-State workshop concentrates on the individual events, including both speaking and interpretive events.

"The workshop is also of high quality because it is very carefully organized and has very good teachers," Nichols said.

The students have spent the week gathering and cutting material for the interpretive events and researching and writing speeches for the speaking events. Ross said the highlight of the week's activities is a mini-tournament, to be held Friday in Nichols Hall. It will give the students a chance to hone their performance and delivery skills.

"It's really more a practice session than a tournament because the kids have only had a few days to get ready," Ross said.

The rounds are at 8:30 and 10 a.m. and 12:30 p.m. Immediately following will be an awards ceremony. Awards include the outstanding student in each class, best performance in each event and best ballot written by a teacher.

In addition to helping the students find and prepare material, Ross said, the workshop gives the teachers and coaches a chance to work together, compare ideas and build material files.

"It's a wonderful way to develop dialogue with the coaches," Ross said. "It helps them get fired up for another year, and they recommend our program to students who are looking for a college forensics team."

One of the best features of the workshop is that high school students can work with college students who compete in forensics tournaments around the nation, said Jan Pope, teacher from Valley Heights High School.

Ross said although the workshop is not used as a recruiting tool, it does give potential students the chance to see the campus. Five of the students enrolled in the workshop will be attending K-State and competing with the forensics team in the fall.

Day lillies sauteed in butter and herbs make a tasty side dish.

Tools of the trade include (clockwise) rose water, rose extract, roses, marigolds, dried hibiscus for tea, day lillies and flower candies.

Stop and eat the roses...

A friend is hosting a dinner party. Everything is arranged like the cover of a magazine, including a tray of homemade dip surrounded by fresh fruits and vegetables. Bordering the vegetables are bright, strongly scented marigolds.

One guest jokingly asks, "Are we suppose to eat these flowers, too?" The hostess replies, "Yes, Eileen does."

This scene actually took place for Eileen Schofield Barkley, associate editor of the Agricultural Experiment Station, who teaches a class on edible flowers for University for Man. She concluded her story by describing how other curious guests grabbed flowers and ran them through the dip. As expected, Barkley was then flooded with flowery conversation.

Although her job at K-State has nothing to do with flowers, Barkley said she has a strong botany background.

Barkley said she first heard of flower cooking 10 years ago while at The New York Botanical Gardens. She began collecting the few cookbooks available on the subject and started experimenting with different recipes.

Like any other cookbook, Barkley said she had to weed through the good and bad dish ideas nurturing a list of experimental successes. From these seeds grew the class she designed, which as far as she knows is the only one ever offered at UFM.

The main purpose flowers serve in cooking is to season, garnish or add color accent, Barkley said. They can replace herbs to flavor butter or vinegar, while others can be battered and deep fried or eaten raw.

Not all flowers are edible, so Barkley said people should follow the list she provides. Although some wildflowers are edible, people should avoid them, because most are poisonous and can cause confusion, even for experts, she said.

Edible flowers available in the summer include carnations, clover, day lilies, elder, gladiolus, nasturtiums, roses, squash blossoms, yucca and marigolds. Those found in the spring include dandelions, tulips and violets. Chrysanthemums bloom in the fall.

To avoid contracting an illness, begin by picking flowers that haven't been sprayed by chemicals. Buds can be used, too. In fact, they will provide flavor while keeping their shape better than flowers.

Next, smell the flower. As a general rule, the stronger the scent, the better the flavor. Remove the green parts under the flower and pull off the petals if the recipe requires it. In addition, cut off the white bases of petals because they tend to be bitter.

Some flowers can be eaten whole. One way to prepare tulips and squash blossoms is stuffing them with chicken or egg salad or dipping them in batter and deep frying. A nasturtium can be eaten raw.

Barkley said most flowers lose their flavoring and texture when exposed to heat. For best results she said to use them raw or add them to cooked dishes at the last minute.

"They have a very delicate nature," she said.

The most flavorful and versatile of all edible flowers are day lilies, nasturtiums, marigolds, squash blossoms and chrysanthemums, Barkley said.

Rose water and rose extract can add flavor to food, especially sweet dishes. Barkley said she used them in her rose cookie recipe. The rose water can usually be found at gourmet grocery stores or pharmacies, but rose extract is difficult to locate.

As tasteful as flowers may be, they don't carry much nutritional value — just a small amount of vitamins, she said.

"You certainly couldn't survive on flowers alone," Barkley said.

The uses flowers serve in meal planning are as varied as they are in decorating, so be creative. Add them to soups, salads, dips, omelets, stir-fried dishes and desserts. But, for now here are two simple recipes recommended by Barkley.

SAUTEED DAY LILIES

12-15 day lily flowers and large buds, 2 tablespoons of margarine or butter, 2 scallions minced, 1 teaspoon of chopped parsley, ½ teaspoon dried tarragon or oregano, salt and pepper to taste. Trim stems from flowers, rinse in cold water and pat dry on paper towels. In a skillet, melt butter and saute scallions for 3-4 minutes. Add seasonings and flowers. Saute for 3-4 minutes and serve immediately.

ROSEY ORANGES

1 large can mandarin oranges, 1-2 tablespoons of rose water and a pinch of cinnamon. Drain oranges and place in bowl. Add rose water and sprinkle with cinnamon. Cover and store in refrigerator until well chilled.

Barkley's one-day flower cooking course, which she teaches out of her home, will be offered on UFM's fall schedule.

'Cat Crew resumes practice

By The Collegian Staff

While all other University sports teams are not in action, the K-State Crew has the opportunity to tune their skills by practicing and competing in regattas during the summer months.

One setback, though, has already struck the squad. That setback was the cancellation, due to high waters, of the Sooner Games, which were scheduled to be held in Tulsa, Okla., this weekend.

"I look for Kansas State to contend," said crew coach Don Rose, prior to the cancellation of the regatta.

"I don't necessarily look for a victory because we just started in summer school, and we really haven't had a chance to have a lot of practices and to get our people positioned in the boat," Rose said. "It takes a little while to run through (the positions)."

The Sooner Games would have hosted crews from Tulsa, Wichita, Austin and Dallas, Texas, and possibly other areas, Rose said.

There are two other opportunities for K-State's crew team to compete this season, however. Those come in the forms of the Chicago Sprint and the Gateway (St. Louis) regattas on July 18 and Aug. 1, respectively.

Rose said the tradition of excellence associated with K-State crews of the past is starting to show once again.

"I think that our tradition at Kansas State in the last two to three years has improved greatly," he said. "We're back where we were years ago and based on the spirit and the guts of the crew, that's going to carry them and make up for some of the problems we have here early in the season."

The Chicago Sprint regatta will give virtually everyone on the crew a chance to compete because it will also feature beginners' races.

"That's going to be a nice trip for us, in that most of the students have never been up to Chicago, and we'll not only race our experienced people but we'll also be taking up our people who are new to rowing this summer and racing them in beginner races. They will have had approximately a month on the water then," Rose said.

The crew will wind up the summer with the Gateway Regatta in St. Louis, as the inexperienced rowers will again compete.

Placing in U.S. Open raises Watson's hopes for future tournaments

By The Associated Press

Tom Watson barely missed his first tournament victory in three frustrating years, but his second-place finish in the U.S. Open gave him something almost as valuable.

"It gave me a lot of confidence," he said Wednesday as he joined the field for the $700,000 Sammy Davis Jr.-Greater Hartford Open.

Second place in the U.S. Open was Watson's best finish since the 1985 Hertz Bay Hill Classic, in which he also placed second.

"Very simply, I hadn't been playing as well as I did in the U.S. Open ... and you might say you can take that confidence to the bank."

With Scott Simpson, the tour's leading money maker, sitting out the Greater Hartford Open, Watson has emerged as a favorite based on the near-victory.

The GHO's celebrity pro-am was played Wednesday at the par-71, 6,786-yard Tournament Players Club of Connecticut course. The tournament begins Thursday.

Other notables taking a breather include Greg Norman, Larry Mize, Payne Stewart, Corey Pavin and Seve Ballesteros.

That leaves the tournament wide open for the likes of Watson and defending GHO champion Mac O'Grady, who finished in a tie for ninth at the U.S. Open.

The 1986 Greater Hartford Open was O'Grady's first tour victory, and he followed it in January with a victory in the Mony Tournament of Champions.

But O'Grady, like Watson, had missed the cut in three straight tournaments before the Memorial Tournament, where he finished in a tie for 21st.

Others competing for the $126,000 top prize will be Paul Azinger, the tour's No. 2 money-winner, veterans Ray Floyd and Fuzzy Zoeller, John Mahaffey and West German Bernhard Langer, who is making his first appearance in the Greater Hartford Open.

"Guys like Watson and Langer have been really swinging well," said Hubert Green. "So I guess they might have a little better chance than some of the rest of us."

Watson, the winner of 31 tournaments in his 16-year career but none since the 1984 Western Open, almost passed up the GHO after his one-stroke loss to Simpson at the U.S. Open.

In the minutes following, he said he wouldn't play in Hartford. But after asking his wife, Linda, and his caddy, Watson changed his mind and committed to the GHO with about five minutes to spare.

Watson said the strong showing last week would outweigh the disappointment of not ending his three-year slump.

"I just came up one shot short, that's all. You certainly don't dwell on it. You just go out, try to do the same things and see if you can do one shot better," he said.

Rowdy fans result in non-alcohol sections

By The Associated Press

Baseball and beer, an American tradition, has become a troublesome combination.

Concern over rowdiness by drunken fans has led a number of major league teams to establish non-drinking sections and enact other restrictions on alcohol consumption.

The latest team to respond to the problem is the New York Yankees, who announced Tuesday that an alcohol-free seating section would be set aside at Yankee Stadium. The New York Mets are expected to take a similar action at Shea Stadium.

The announcement by the Yankees came one day after a New York state senator withdrew a proposal which would have required New York teams to set aside non-drinking sections.

Mat Stolley, manager of Arlington Stadium, home of the Texas Rangers, says "alcohol-related incidents are the biggest problem we have. It's mostly just rowdy behavior, but sometimes we get drunks out there who call people on the field all kinds of names."

"Sometimes it escalates into fights."

At 64,000-seat Anaheim Stadium, home of the California Angels, 2,400 seats in left field are designated as a "family section" where no beer is allowed and fans are asked not to smoke or use profanity. The section hasn't been filled for any game this season.

"The family section resulted from a request from fans," Angels spokesman Tim Mead said. "It has been slow catching on, but comments from fans show the section has been well received."

Two clubs owned by breweries, St. Louis and Toronto, do not have beer-free zones.

"Our fans in St. Louis are good fans, we've got good training programs in place regulating beer management and rowdiness, and this is what makes it such a nice facility to come to," said Jack Croghan, marketing manager for Civic Center Corp., which owns and operates Busch Stadium.

At San Diego-Jack Murphy Stadium, sales of alcoholic beverages have been cut off after the seventh inning since midway through the 1986 season.

Rico Picardi, vice president of operations for concessionaire Harry M. Stevens, said he doesn't think fans are bothered by the restrictions on beer sales and consumption at ballparks.

"I think the customers are happy as long as it's cold and wet," he said.

Stevens runs concessions at Shea Stadium, the Astrodome at Houston, Candlestick Park at San Francisco and Fenway Park at Boston.

A's dump KC, 4-2; Jackson loses again

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — Curt Young and Dennis Eckersley combined on a five-hitter and Mike Davis drove in three runs with a pair of singles Wednesday to lead the Oakland Athletics to a 4-2 victory over the Kansas City Royals.

Young, 9-4, pitched seven innings and allowed four hits, losing his shutout on Juan Beniquez' two-run homer in the seventh. He struck out five and walked two.

Eckersley pitched one-hit ball over the final two innings for his third save.

Kansas City left-hander Danny Jackson, 3-10, became the first 10-game loser in the major leagues this season. He allowed four runs and eight hits in 5 2-3 innings.

Mark McGwire and Jose Canseco led off the Oakland second with consecutive singles. McGwire went to third on Ron Cey's fly out to right and scored on Davis' single.

McGwire started the sixth inning with a single and Canseco doubled to put runners on second and third. After Cey struck out, Davis lined a 2-2 pitch into right field, scoring both runners.

Mickey Tettleton singled Davis to third and Stan Javier scored him on a suicide squeeze.

Young walked Frank White with one out in the seventh before Beniquez broke an 0-for-17 streak with his third homer of the season.

The Royals' only other major threat came in the first inning when George Brett doubled with two out and Danny Tartabull walked. But White's deep drive to left was caught at the top of the wall by Canseco.

The victory moved the Athletics past the Royals and into second place in the American League West.

Football team receives air-conditioned facility

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

By the beginning of August, K-State's football players will be dressing in the lap of luxury.

A new locker room facility, which will be located on the west side of the existing locker room, will provide the football team with 3,000 square feet of air-conditioned space.

The locker room currently used was built in the late 1960s and does not provide enough room for the coaches to make eye contact with all the players or to draw up plays that can be seen by everyone during a half-time, said Mike Jones, business manager of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. It also has no air conditioning, thus preventing ventilation and making the air stagnant.

"We have grown out of our existing locker room," he said. "Most people think that when the players run out onto the field that they've just come out of a nice, big, air-conditioned locker room."

"But I think, if you took some of the fans down and showed them what it's really like, they'd really be surprised."

The new facility is part of a mutual agreement between Athletic Director Larry Travis and Stan Parrish, head football coach.

"Parrish looked around at what things needed improvement, and the locker room was one of them," Jones said.

The Kansas Board of Regents approved the $120,000 contract, and Travis has been recruiting donors for the project, he said.

"So far, we've raised in the neighborhood of $100,000 by private donations from people who are interested in the athletic program and materials such as the rock, cement and roofing from area construction companies," Jones said.

"No student funds will be used to finance this building; it's strictly by donations," he said. "We want a wider, more open locker room and we hope it will help in recruiting and be more functional for the team."

The old locker room will be used as a weight room for all K-State athletes and provide a place for athletes to rehabilitate and for trainers to tape injuries.

The new facility is part of a plan by the athletic department to upgrade the KSU Stadium facilities by renovating structures gradually, Jones said.

"Most of the things at the football field were put there temporarily, but it's been 20 years since some things have been updated," he said. "It's just like a farmer buying a new tractor. We're replacing things slowly to keep them from falling apart."

Rain halts Wimbledon

By The Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — Martina Navratilova, Steffi Graf and Mats Wilander led a blitz by a host of seeded players through the first-round of the Wimbledon tennis championships Wednesday.

Of the 19 seeds in action on a day when the sun made its first appearance at the All England Club, only one, Spain's Emilio Sanchez, a clay-court specialist, dropped a set.

Because rain washed out Monday's entire schedule and forced Tuesday's action to begin late, play Wednesday's began about two hours earlier than usual. And the speed with which the top players dispatched their foes, especially the women, must have pleased tournament officials.

Navratilova needed only 32 minutes to crush West Germany's Claudia Porwik 6-1, 6-0, while Graf, the 18-year-old West German right-hander, took 42 minutes to eliminate Adriana Villigran of Argentina 6-0, 6-2.

No. 3 Chris Evert, a two-time Wimbledon champion, defeated Britain's Sara Gomer 6-1, 6-0 in 43 minutes; No. 4 Helena Sukova of Czechoslovakia downed Britain's Jo Louis 6-1, 6-4 in 45 minutes; and No. 5 Pam Shriver routed Natalia Medvedeva of the Soviet Union 6-2, 6-1 in 41 minutes.

The men, playing best-of-five-set matches, took longer but still were quick. Wilander, the third seed from Sweden, beat Gary Muller of South Africa 6-2, 6-1, 6-4 in one hour, 22 minutes.

The three American women triumphed in fine style, Navratilova winning her last 11 games, Evert her final 10 games and Shriver 10 of the last 11 games.

In men's play, No. 5 Miloslav Mecir of Czechoslovakia, No. 6 Yannick Noah of France, No. 7 Jimmy Connors of the United States, No. 8 Andres Gomez of Ecuador, No. 9 Henri Leconte of France and three Americans, No. 10 Tim Mayotte, No. 15 David Pate and No. 16 Kevin Curren won in straight sets joined Wilander in winning in straight sets.

Navratilova, seeking a record sixth straight Wimbledon singles crown and her first tournament title of 1987, was perfect against Porwik.

Scuba divers frequent area lakes, quarries throughout year

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Although Kansas has many beautiful lakes, a tourist probably would not associate scuba diving with the state.

However, during summer and winter, hundreds of residents don their masks, fins, snorkels and tanks and plunge into the lakes and quarries of Kansas and its neighboring states.

"There is some scuba diving in Kansas," said Tim Argo, manager of Divers Down, a scuba shop at 103 S. Fourth St.

"Milford and Wilson lakes are popular, and there are a few quarries in Pittsburg and Galena, but you could run across Tuttle (Creek Reservoir) if you wanted. The only people who dive there have lost something," said Argo, a diving enthusiast for five years.

Argo said many divers prefer to go to the Ozarks, Missouri lakes and the Caribbean Sea.

But some "hardy souls" like to ice-dive during the winter, too, he said. Lakes are clearer with a layer of ice, but divers wear a "dry suit" — a suit made of rubber-coated nylon with long johns the thickness of a sleeping bag underneath. Also, divers carry lights, just as they frequently do in the summer.

Serious participants own all of their equipment and only use the shop to fill their air tanks, Argo said. "A good set of equipment might run $1,000," he said. "But with proper care, it should last a lifetime."

Argo said people scuba dive because it provides them with a unique experience. Often they find anchors, knives, fishing poles and other equipment. A friend of his once found a diamond ring.

If an area is a popular place to People searching for 'unique' treasures dive, the fish are friendlier, too. The bluegills especially will take food right out of a diver's hand, he said.

Divers Down begins a new class every two to three weeks during the summer and every three to four weeks during the fall and winter. Participants must buy their own mask, fins, and snorkel, but the rest of the equipment, air and instruction comes under the $200 fee.

There is no limit to the number of people per class, but each instructor prefers to have no more than 10, Argo said.

Students spend about 10 hours in the pool, 10 hours in the classroom and two days in the lake, where they make four dives, he said. During the winter, students complete the pool and classroom segments of the course and wait until the spring or summer before diving at the lake.

Argo said those successfully completing the course receive a lifetime certificate from the Professional Association of Diving Instructors.

The youngest age a person may start is 13, and those under 15 are called junior scuba divers. This means they may only dive in the company of an adult, he said.

"Although divers are certified, it is advisable to take a refresher course every few years," Argo said. "It's easy to forget some vital rules."

"For one thing, a diver should never hold his breath because constant inhaling and exhaling keeps body pressure equal. This is especially important when ascending so that his lungs don't expand too much."

A diver should always have a buddy and never allow an amateur to teach him anything, he said.

Also, it is important for divers to constantly check pressure and depth gauges and dive table — a chart telling the recommended length of time underwater at a given depth, Argo said. Although it is correlated with Navy divers, it can be adjusted for recreational users.

In class, participants learn to clear their masks of water and share an air hose with a buddy. They discuss the buying of good equipment and how to put it on, he said.

"Also, they learn to swim underwater with minimal arm motion and straight-legged kicks," Argo said. "When a diver is 'neutrally buoyant' — a constant condition when the diver neither sinks nor floats — he has adjusted his buoyancy compensation device (air vest) to the right pressure and can swim horizontally."

The hardest part about scuba diving is carrying the equipment to and from the car, he said.

Although Argo has not had many accidents in his four years of teaching, he said sometimes people forget to turn on their air or attempt to clear their goggles, having left their masks on the boat. Argo said one time he was "attacked" by a tree that fell on him underwater.

"Some divers are more susceptible to the bends, too," Argo said. "Women, older people and those who are out of shape must be more careful. The bends is an excessive accumulation of nitrogen in the body due to an extended period underwater where the pressure is increased."

Every few weeks, Divers Down give a free demonstration at the Junction City YMCA for anyone interested in learning to scuba dive, he said.

Campgrounds await July 4th holiday

By DEBRA COUTURE
Collegian Reporter

With the July Fourth weekend fast approaching, many folks are casting a covetous eye at the surrounding area in hopes of securing a small plot of land on which to "rough it."

Tuttle Creek and Milford state parks offer outdoor camping facilities with electricity and other specialties to anyone desiring a flavor of the outdoors.

Stanley Curtis, Tuttle Creek park manager, said all vehicles must have a $2 daily permit.

"We have two boat ramps, but there are no gasoline-powered motorboats allowed in the River Pond area, only boats with electrical motors and sailboats," Curtis said.

There is a swimming area and showers, and people can bring their dogs provided the animals are on leashes.

"There is no hard liquor allowed in the park and 3.2 beer must be approved prior to use," Curtis said.

In Milford State Park the rules are similar, said Luceine Bush, tourist guide.

"We have three boat launches, showers, restrooms and a swimming area," Bush said.

There are two camping areas supervised by the Tuttle Creek Corps of Engineers, said Dale Forge, project manager.

"There is no charge in Stockdale or Tuttle Creek Cove because they aren't built up," Forge said, adding that Stockdale does have showers, but Tuttle Creek Cove only has a comfort station.

Camping areas are used on a first-come, first-served basis. Leashed pets are allowed, and both areas have boat ramps, Forge said.

"In the Outlet Park we have group shelters that we take reservations on. Some have electricity and the cost is $10 for six hours and $15 for over six hours, but no overnight camping is allowed in this area," Forge said. Reservations must be made at the Tuttle Creek Corps of Engineers office and paid for one day prior to the day of use.

Harvey Brink, Milford Corps of Engineers park manager, said the Milford Corps of Engineers oversees four camping areas: Farnum Creek, Rolling Hills, Timber Creek and Curtis Creek.

The parks have some differences, but some rules apply to both. Leashed pets are allowed on all the parks, and drinking alcoholic beverages is prohibited on all the beaches because "liquor and swimming don't mix," Brink said. However, 3.2 beer is allowed in the camp areas with a permit.

Marian and Charles Brown live in their motor home at Farnum Creek.

"I'm not old enough to retire yet, so this is my job," said Marian Brown, Farnum Creek park manager. Brown manages a park in Kansas during the summer, then bids to manage a park in Fort Worth, Texas, during the winter. Anyone can bid to run a camping area, and the person with the lowest bid, or who will do it for the lowest pay, secures the job.

"It is perfect for us because Charles is retired and I am an avid bird and wildflower watcher," Brown said. "This job enables me to do that."

The single-spaces camping area is locked at 10 p.m. and opened at 7 a.m.

"We leave the gate security of the group camping area to the people staying there," Brown said.

"We have a nice swimming area and two playgrounds — one near the boat ramp and the other in camping area one," she said.

"It's not really a work job. We just enjoy meeting people," said Tommy Howell, who manages Rolling Hills camp area with his wife Shirley.

"We are retired from Mississippi, and we travel to different places in the summer," Howell said.

Campground pads are $8 a night with electricity and $6 without. Showers and comfort stations are in the park along with a swimming area and playground, he said.

Near the camp is a marina where boats may be rented and snacks may be purchased, he said.

"We've never been here before, but we like it," said Eloise Hoems, who manages Timber Creek Park with her husband Mel.

"They call us the 'Ma and Pa' of the camp," she said.

The camping pads do not have electricity and are $5 a night. The north part of the camp is locked at 10 p.m. and opened at 7 a.m., and the south part is open but patrolled often, Hoems said.

Korean dissidents ask for concessions

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — Opposition leaders called Wednesday for massive new protests to oust the government and said talks with President Chun Doo-hwan failed because he refused to compromise.

"We condemn the current regime's scheme to prolong its power," Kim Young-sam, head of the Reunification Democratic Party, said after meeting with Chun for three hours at the presidential mansion.

"In order to strive for fuller democratization we and the other democratic forces pledge to continue our non-violent and peaceful struggle," Kim said.

Kim said Chun refused to revoke his April 13 decision suspending debate on changing the way South Korea elects its president.

But the government said it wanted talks and urged the opposition to agree to negotiations on a compromise.

The opposition launched a drive June 10 to oust the government and force elections, leading to the worst political violence since Chun took power in 1980.

The government fulfilled its promise to release another top opposition leader, Kim Dae-jung, who had been under house arrest in Seoul since April 8. He told supporters Chun was determined to hang onto power.

Opposition leaders said they would go ahead with plans for nationwide "peace marches" Friday to step up efforts to oust the government and establish direct presidential elections to replace the electoral college system they say favors the ruling party.

Riot police tossed tear gas grenades and charged with shields into a crowd of 1,000 workers, students and dissidents who tried to demonstrate peacefully in southern Seoul. Hundreds of students later hurled firebombs and rocks at police in street clashes.

Marches and demonstrations were also reported in five other cities.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Gaston Sigur met with Chun, Kim Dae-jung and Roh Tae-woo, the ruling party chief who has been chosen to succeed Chun when the president's term expires in February 1988.

Governor to address meeting of Kansas Vietnam veterans

From Staff and Wire Reports

Gov. Mike Hayden will talk about the unveiling ceremony for Kansas Operation Memorial tonight in Junction City at the regular chapter meeting of the Vietnam Veterans of America.

The North Central Kansas Chapter, based in Junction City, is known as the "Drop Zone" Chapter because of its proximity to Fort Riley, home of the 1st Infantry Division (Mechanized).

Hayden, a 1966 graduate of K-State in secondary education, saw action in the Southeast Asian conflict in 1966 as a lieutenant in the U.S. Army.

Hayden will talk about the July 4 unveiling ceremonies of Kansas Operation Memorial in the downtown City Park at Sixth and Washington streets. The meeting will be at 7 p.m. at Sirloin Stockade, 1029 Washington St.

The $70,000 monument is the only one in the state honoring the 758 Kansans who died during the Vietnam War and 38 others who remain listed as missing in action. It features engravings of soldiers, as well as the names of those honored.

"Although the monument is located in Junction City on the front door of the 1st Infantry Division, the memorial is for those who served in all branches of the military," said Jim Atkins, resident of Junction City and director of Kansas Operation Memorial.

"The seal of each branch of the five services will be etched on the back of the panels," Atkins said.

Traffic was stopped for a short time Wednesday morning as one of the seven slabs of black Virginia granite was trucked into the downtown park.

The granite panels each measure 4 feet wide, 10 feet high and 8 inches thick and weigh about 3,600 pounds, said Bill Arck, director of the Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services and chapter member. Arck is a Vietnam veteran who served in the U.S. Air Force.

For several hours, workers using a U.S. Army crane lowered into place seven granite slabs that together weigh more than 26,000 pounds, setting them in a semicircle.

"This is the largest (monument) I've ever done," said Sam Klugman, whose company, Klugman Monument Co., Wichita, built the memorial.

"You don't sell something like this, you support it," Klugman said.

Panels set to question former aide

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oliver L. North, the central figure in the Iran-Contra affair, will tell his own story at the nationally televised hearings beginning July 7 after being questioned privately next week, the congressional panels said Wednesday. They said they had not made concessions North had demanded as a condition for his appearance.

North had earlier refused to testify privately, and his lawyers had set conditions limiting the length and scope of his public testimony.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, chairman of the Senate investigating panel, said at the end of Wednesday's hearing, that North attorney Brendan Sullivan had been informed "we would make no commitment on limiting Col. North's testimony or promise not to recall him as a witness."

However, he added, the letter also made clear that "we do not intend his testimony to last more than a week or anticipate that he will be recalled."

Sullivan declined to say whether he had agreed to the terms disclosed by the committees. "I just can't talk about it," he said when contacted by telephone.

Inouye's announcement came at the end of a long day in which former CIA general counsel Stanley Sporkin was the only witness.

Sporkin defended President Reagan's decision against notifying Congress about the secret arms sales to Iran, which began in 1985, but suggested it was wrong of the administration to keep the secret as long as it did.

North, in his only previous appearance on the Iran-Contra matter before a congressional committee, claimed his constitutional right against testifying on the ground he might incriminate himself. The former National Security Council aide is the subject of a criminal investigation by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh.

He will be testifying before Congress under a grant of limited immunity from prosecution, which means his testimony cannot be used against him later.

Leaders of the congressional panels, while negotiating for the past week with Sullivan about conditions for North's testimony, have taken pains to make clear they were guaranteeing nothing.

"I would simply point out that in this agreement we certainly did not make any concessions," said Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., chairman of the House committee. "We set the terms, we set the timing of the testimony, we set the length of the testimony and we have only given Mr. Sullivan, counsel of Col. North, a statement of our intentions."

The closed-door questioning on July 1 will be limited to President Reagan's knowledge of using the arms-sale proceeds for aid to the rebels.

"I would not say there is great euphoria in the cloakroom," said Sen. William Cohen, R-Maine.

Former president earns scholarship

Former Student Body President Steve Johnson, was the recipient of the WIBW Farm Broadcasting Scholarship this summer.

Johnson, a senior in Agricultural Economics, received $2,500 and a full-time summer position with the WIBW farm broadcast department.

Working under the direction of Kelly Lenz, Johnson will be involved with news reporting and broadcast production. Johnson will continue to write news stories and features for the station during his senior year.

Graduate receives agency internship

A K-State graduate, Lisa V. Becker, recently received a National Presidential Management Internship.

Becker, a December graduate with a master's degree in public administration, was notified in May that she would be placed in a management position with an agency of the executive branch of the federal government. She is one of 200 finalists from over 500 applications.

K-State was the only Kansas institution with a presidential intern finalist. The University of Missouri was the only other Big Eight university to place a finalist.

Schellhardt earns vice president job

The former director of the K-State Budget Office, Thomas Schellhardt, was promoted to assistant vice president for administration and finance this past Thursday.

Schellhardt is replacing John A. Moore Jr., who left the University in May to accept the controller's position at the University of Oklahoma.

Schellhardt had been with the K-State budget office for one year before his promotion. He will now be responsible for the Budget Office, the Controller's Office and Information Systems.

Student nominees to study abroad

Two students have been nominated for Rotary International scholarships. Susan D. Baird and Candice L. Leonard were nominated by Rotary District 571.

Baird, a May 1987 graduate with a double major in journalism and mass communications and history, would like to study law in the Fiji Islands.

Leonard, senior in human ecology and mass communications, hopes to study in either Australia, England or Canada to work on a master's degree in journalism and mass communications.

Board reaccredits education college

The Kansas Board of Education has reaccredited the College of Education. The certification mark is imperative because it allows graduates of the college to teach in Kansas.

"State accreditation is essential for us. It's not an option. It is almost the only way our graduates can work in the state," said Jerry Horn, associate dean of the college.

Kansas law requires graduates from state institutions to have degrees from accredited schools in order to teach in Kansas.

In addition to state accreditation, the College of Education is nationally accredited by the National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education.

Compact

a good proposal," Gross said. "The interests of Kansas will not be served unless the compact is held accountable. Rushing the site selection process will only make matters worse."

The lawmakers warned they will introduce a bill to withdraw Kansas from the compact in the special session, planned for the fall, if the governor and the compact commission don't address the issues.

"We are prepared to introduce this bill on the first day of the session," Sebelius said. "I think the question of withdrawing may still be premature, depending on answers to the questions on the table."

Gross said he believes there will be a lot of support in the Legislature for such a bill on both sides of the political aisle.

Both lawmakers criticized the "sordid history" of the two developers who are bidding for the exclusive contract to build the multi-million waste dump.

Sebelius noted US Ecology of Louisville, Ky., has had well-documented problems with dumps it has operated in Kentucky and Illinois. She said a $97 million lawsuit facing the company stemming from leaking at its Sheffield, Ill., facility threatens to bankrupt the company.

The other developer, Westinghouse Electric Corp. of Madison, Pa., has no experience operating commercial radioactive waste dumps and Sebelius said the company's work in the field of hazardous waste handling shows "significant problems."

"Westinghouse paid one of the largest penalties in history of hazardous waste operations in this country for dumping toxic wastes and there's some question as to whether US Ecology will even survive its lawsuit," she said.

The liability issue is one of major importance, Sebelius said, referring to questions over whether the developer or the compact states will be liable for costs arising from accidents and environmental contamination which might occur at the waste dump.

soil moisture.

The first group, atmospheric boundary layer, is studying the area extending 100 meters from the earth's surface to 2,000 meters, the upper limit of the atmosphere.

With the use of radio sound balloons, infrared laser systems known as LIDAR, and King Air aircraft equipped with gust probes, an atmospheric measuring device, the group is measuring temperature zones, water vapor levels and the amount of suspended particles in the atmosphere.

The data collected will help define the momentum heat flux — the mixing of temperature, water vapor and suspended particles throughout the atmosphere. The heat flux is caused by turbulent air currents or motion in the atmosphere.

Scientists in the second group, surface flux, want to estimate the water loss on the test site. This loss is caused by the heating of the air and the use of water by plants and the soil as an insulation against solar radiation.

The group is concerned with the area up to 10 meters above the earth's surface. They will be measuring the sun's radiation, the concentration of water vapor and levels of carbon dioxide.

The third group, corrections and calibrations, is comparing information gathered from satellite remote sensing to data collected from aircraft and ground equipment. They want to determine how the atmosphere affects remotely sensed data.

"If the scientists can understand how the changes in atmosphere affect remote sensing, they can adjust for that interference in other similar conditions," Asrar said.

The group calibrates and registers all the data based on area landmarks. Tuttle Creek Reservoir, Interstate 70 and Milford Lake are the largest used.

"The satellites are 570 miles above the earth's surface," Asrar said. "The markers have to be large enough to be seen by the satellites."

The fourth group, surface radiances and biology, is the study of plants and how they interact with their environment.

This group measures the different plant-covered areas and identifies the specific plants. They measure surface temperature, moisture and energy given off by the area. The goal is to relate energy levels to the specific plant characteristics of the research area.

The group also studies plants to measure photosynthesis and levels of carbon dioxide.

The mission of the final group, soil moisture, is to discover the soil moisture content. By measuring the microwave energy being given off by the earth's surface, the moisture level can be determined.

Scientists on the ground use hand held microwave radiometers, microwave measuring devices. NASA's C-130 plane will carry a microwave radiometer to measure the ground moisture from the air.

Additional moisture data will be collected by a gamma ray sensor on the National Oceanic Atmospheric Administration aircraft. This data will be compared with the information gathered on the ground to find out how accurate remote sensing can be.

A completely separate group of scientists, the Integrated Science Group, has been assembled to work with the huge amount of data being collected. Its goal is to put together a model showing the reaction of the atmosphere and the biosphere on the weather.

Library

In addition, libraries have a problem with differential pricing. Publishers charge libraries a great deal more than an individual on the premise that more people will see the publications. Grass said the result is libraries absorb the cost of inflation for individual subscribers by paying higher costs.

Grass said this applies to all serials, both foreign and domestic, however, another form of differential pricing occurs with foreign publishers. For example, a German publisher might set one price in marks for his local audience, and another price twice as high in marks for the United States and Canada.

When this already high cost is transferred to the devalued dollar, the German publisher gains even more income.

Hobrock said there is no reason for such a policy.

"It's greed. They say the higher cost is to cover postage and delivery, but that's baloney," he said.

Grass said the books sacrificed to purchase the foreign serials were not cut from any one area. The budgets for the different subject areas were cut across the board.

Having diverse academic journals from an international field really is important to K-State as a research institution, Hobrock said.

"There are no borders in the international information exchange," he said.

Grass said since the library will be forced to cancel serial subscriptions for fiscal 1988-89, the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1987, will be spent trying to determine what publications are expendable.

"We will ask the faculty what they consider to be the least essential to the work being done," Grass said.

Farmer said cancelling subscriptions isn't even always the best answer.

"It is possible to cancel titles without injuring programs, due to the work being done at that time," Farmer said. "But if the focus of the department changes, that serial must be re-ordered. Then there is a gap which can still prevent faculty from doing complete research."

Some states are increasing their funding to higher education, believing it is the best way to prepare for the future, Hobrock said.

State industry acts to halt agency criticisms

By SCOTT MILLER
Staff Writer

Complaints from employees of several state agencies, including K-State, regarding the mandatory use of cleaning materials produced by Kansas Correctional Industries in Lansing, has led to the hiring of a consultant firm to assist state agencies in using KCI products.

KCI director Leonard Ewell made the decision after meeting last month with Nicholas Roach, director of state purchases, and employees from several state agencies.

Some employees at K-State, however, said they think the decision will do little to address their complaints about the inadequacy of KCI products.

"We would have no problem using these products if they would work," said Al Seely, chief of custodial services I and facilities services. Seely said the main problem was the "considerable difference" in the quality of the KCI floor-care products compared to name-brand products.

Jerry Sizemore, custodial supervisor II at the Veterinary Medicine Complex, has also complained about the strength of the KCI floor wax, which he said varies greatly from shipment to shipment and is not durable. He said floors must be finished every month with KCI products rather than an annual finishing with private industry products.

"The floor finish is not up to our standards," he said.

Sizemore also said the floors at the Veterinary Medicine Complex were too slippery when KCI spray buffing products were used, making the floor hazardous for patrons.

Eric Muehleisen, administrative officer at Lafene Student Health Center, said KCI floor wax looked good, but needed buffing within a few days, which he said was more often than commercial floor waxes. He said after the floors at Lafene were buffed with the KCI spray buffer, they would not shine and were too slippery.

"You want to project a professional image in health care. With state products, we won't be able to do that," Muehleisen said.

However, Ewell and Roach said they think the problems K-State and other state agencies are having with KCI products are due to improper use. Ewell said independent laboratories have tested KCI products and found them to be satisfactory cleaning products.

"Some people are making a problem out of something that's not," Ewell said. "This matter will be resolved very soon. We know that some of our products have been improperly used...from the descriptions by the agencies (of how they are using the products)."

Roach agreed with Ewell that the problem was the agencies did not know how to use the products because employees at Emporia State University, Wichita State University and the Capitol have said they are satisfied with KCI products.

"If nobody could use them (KCI products), then we wouldn't make anybody use them," Roach said. "But if it works in Topeka, Emporia and Wichita, I don't understand why it won't work at K-State."

Bill Hartman, director of building services, utilities and systems maintenance at Emporia State University, said he "couldn't be more pleased" with the performance of the complete line of KCI products, including the floor stripper.

"It has saved us thousands and thousands of dollars, and it keeps money within the state system, which is important at this time," he said.

Hartman said his colleagues at WSU had indicated they were also satisfied with KCI products.

However, employees at other state agencies maintain their staffs are competent in using floor-care products and that KCI products are inadequate.

"If you can get him (Roach) to come down here and show us how to use these products, that would be great, because if we use them according to the directions on the label, they don't work," said Denise Hinkel, supervisor of the training center for custodial services at K-State. "They're cheap."

Hinkel, who trains custodial workers at K-State to use KCI products, said commercial floor products work two to three times longer than KCI floor products. She said other KCI products, including window cleaner and soap, were also inadequate.

In a May 21 letter to the K-State Controller's Office, Steve Hall, administrative officer at the Veterinary Medicine Complex, complained about the quality of KCI bleach and detergent. The letter also noted packaging problems with the bleach, claiming some bottles leaked, bulged or contained a brown substance.

Marjorie Denton, associate director of facilities operations at KU Medical Center, said although ESU and WSU praised KCI products at the May meeting, 11 other state agencies in attendance complained about the floor products.

Denton said her staff and the staffs at other agencies have had problems with other KCI products, but they decided to emphasize only their complaints about KCI floor products at

Visitors may pay to park

By MICKEY FORNARO
Collegian Reporter

The University Ad Hoc Committee on Parking Utilization sent a recommendation to the administration that visitors pay a $2 parking fee to park on campus.

In addition, the committee suggested using the northern section of the Union's parking lot now zoned for student use as a pay parking area.

Mark Taussig, University architect and the committee's secretary, said the group was looking for a way to raise more revenue so they would not have to increase the price of student parking permits.

Taussig said the committee estimated about 50,000 visitors come to the campus a year. If each was charged $2 a day, $100,000 would be generated in a year. Currently, visitors are given free parking passes allowing them to park in any lot.

The Union parking lot is the most used by visitors, students and faculty. This creates "a real bottleneck" in the lot, he said.

For this reason, Taussig said, the committee suggested redefining the parking lot's status as a pay parking area. How visitor parking permits would be issued has not been resolved. The use of parking meters has also been suggested.

Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, stated his disapproval of the $2 fee in a letter to committee member Larry Garvin, director of Facilities Planning.

Bosco said in the letter he wanted to be as supportive as possible to the committee in its work to develop a comprehensive parking plan, but he could not support a visitor parking fee.

Furthermore, he said any deterrent in the process of encouraging students and their families to visit campus could have long-range diminishing returns.

The proposal has not been finalized yet, and Taussig said he believes, "the administration probably won't put it through."

The committee also tentatively recommended creating 800 additional parking spaces at "acceptable sites," and making 400 spaces by redesigning and restriping existing parking lots.

Idea to tie schools to state economy

By CHRIS DOLL
Campus Editor

The Kansas Board of Regents has a new argument to convince the Legislature to fund the institutions: tying higher education funding to the state's economic development.

"We could help the state's economy," said President Jon Wefald, "but we need proper funding if we are to continue to research."

The idea is not new, he said, adding that California, Illinois, Massachusetts and Texas schools have used the tactic successfully.

Kansas' major industries — agriculture, oil and aviation — are all failing. Some of the University's applied research projects could help the state diversify its economy, Wefald said.

"It is important to make a major investment in new faculty positions and research support if Kansas intends to strengthen its ability to be competitive and attractive for future growth and development," he said in a letter to Jim Braden, speaker of the Kansas House.

The University's strategic planning program reflects the concern for helping the state economy. The College of Arts and Sciences planning report emphasized research in chemistry, biochemistry, physics and biology.

At the Regents' June 25 meeting, Wefald said he would like to help "expand student opportunities" and to stimulate the economy through the College of Human Ecology.

"We want to put together a nifty hotel and restaurant program — one of the most outstanding in the Midwest," he said.

Tying funding to economic development to receive more money may be a new concept, but the link has always existed, Wefald said.

"K-State has in the past, is now and will continue to contribute (to) economic development of the state," he said.

Arkan wheat, released for production by K-State in 1981, has brought revenues to the state through larger wheat harvests. Wefald also said the University added money to farm revenues by saving in livestock shrinkage and reduction of animal respiratory diseases.

Kansas ranks 14th nationally in state appropriations vs. population, said Ray Hauke, director of planning and budget for the Board of Regents. But it has been losing ground.

"It's important to look where you started to where you are going," he said. "In the last two years, Kansas ranked 46th in the amount of appropriations."

Kansas has increased the funding by 102 percent in the last 10 years, which "sounds like a lot of money," but the national average was 133 percent, he said.

The Board of Regents' argument is trying to sell $177 million in additional funds to the Legislature for fiscal years 1989-91. The plan calls for $39 million additional funds for fiscal 1989. K-State used this Margin of Excellence when making the five-year strategic planning program.

"It is designed to move us to 95 percent of funding and bring us to 100 percent of the average faculty salaries of our peer institutions," Hauke said.

If the Legislature funds the plan, K-State faculty could see 8 percent increases in their salaries for the next three years, Wefald said.

Securing the increases, Wefald told the Regents, is the University's main objective. Without quality faculty, research cannot continue.

Citing figures from an April 1986 report by the University of Nevada-Reno, Wefald said K-State's faculty salaries, after compensating for all taxes and the cost of living, rank 49th out of 51 national land-grant institutions. The proposed increase, which would cost the state about $6 million, would raise the figure to around the 30th mark.

Wefald said he attributed losses in faculty to the salaries. The College of Agriculture lost three professors, the College of Engineering lost three "key" professors and the Department of Physics lost two physicists to offers "the University could not begin to match," he said. K-State also lost two of its three exercise physiologists to other institutions, while the College of Architecture and Design lost two faculty, he said.

Wefald said the average K-State faculty pay is $29,000. Purdue University, Chicago, is considered a leading land-grant institution, and its faculty receives an average salary of $40,000, he said. Peer institutions' salaries are about $5,000 ahead of K-State's, Wefald said.

When Wednesday arrives Kansans will be tearing up their club cards, not smoking in public buildings, buying stamps for drugs and wearing safety belts.

For an establishment to serve liquor by the drink, 30 percent of its sales must be from food, said Joe Knopp, majority leader, Kansas House of Representatives.

"Clubs can choose to remain private," and the clubs in "dry" counties will still require a membership or reciprocal club card, he said.

Bob Limbocker, manager of the Cotton Club, 418 Poyntz Ave., said the law will benefit restaurants especially at anniversaries and birthday parties. The club will have liquor by the drink.

"We will not be using club cards," said Rusty Wilson, manager of Aggie Station, 3240 Kimball Ave.

Along with more lenient liquor laws, Kansans will have fewer places to smoke.

"It is up to the management of the building if they desire a smoking area or not," Knopp said.

Currently, public buildings are marked in the areas where smoking is prohibited. The new law states public buildings are non-smoking and areas that allow smoking must be designated, he said.

The K-State Union has non-smoking areas, but it is possible the signs will have to be changed to comply with the new law, "which will be expensive," said Jack Sills, acting director of the Union. A meeting with John Lambert, director of Public Safety, Tuesday will decide if the Union is in compliance.

The designated areas must have physical barriers and ventilation, Lambert said. The decision of including a smoking area in a building and its location will be left up to the faculty and staff in the building. The Union will be the only place designated for student smoking.

The illegal drug tax means a stamp must be purchased in order to sell or have possession of marijuana or controlled substances, Knopp said.

The stamps must be purchased starting at 28 grams of marijuana for $3.50. Purchasers will be charged

Chun's successor demands reforms

SEOUL, South Korea — President Chun Doo-hwan's chosen successor made a surprise demand Monday that Chun adopt major democratic reforms, and the opposition immediately called for a direct presidential election by November.

The proposals by Roh Tae-woo, head of the governing Democratic Justice Party and a long-time ally of Chun, followed 18 days of demonstrations and violent street protest.

Roh threatened to resign as party chairman and presidential candidate if Chun refused his demands, and reports indicated he did not consult the president before announcing his decision.

Direct election of the president has been a major opposition demand, but Chun announced in April that discussion of political reform would be postponed until after the 1988 Summer Olympics in Seoul. He said his successor would be chosen by the present electoral college system, which favors the government.

Roh, a former army general like Chun, called for a direct presidential election and declared support for other opposition demands such as press freedom, human rights guarantees and an end to strong central government controls.

NATIONAL

Migrants to stay, authorities decide

WASHINGTON — The Immigration and Naturalization Service, in another concession to farmers, said Monday it will allow migrant farm laborers into the United States upon their word that they worked in past harvests.

The INS previously had insisted that laborers have documents to prove they had harvested perishable crops here. But under pressure from farm groups and lawmakers from the West and South, the agency modified its rules.

"We're saying, OK you don't have to have full documentation but be able to say 'I worked 90 days for the following growers,'" INS Commissioner Alan C. Nelson said. He said workers would have to be "relatively specific as to where they worked and how long."

Beginning Wednesday, illegal aliens seeking Special Agricultural Worker status will fill out an application at a consulate or INS border processing center, pay their $185 fee, and state who they worked for in past harvests and where. Based on that, the workers will be given a 90-day temporary work authorization card and allowed to enter the country. Once here, they must collect the documents and turn them over to the INS before the 90 days expire.

"Obviously what we want to do is get qualified people in as quickly as possible," Nelson said.

Growers have complained that confusion over new immigration reforms have kept migrant workers home and as a result of the labor shortage, their crops are rotting on the vine.

Employees strike at major network

NEW YORK — NBC management got off to a slightly rocky start in the production studios Monday after 2,800 technicians, producers, writers and editors in six cities walked out in a dispute over job security.

With managers behind the cameras and in the control room, NBC's "Today" show was plagued by technical foulups, including fumbled microphones, sloppy camera work and sound lapses that at one point rendered co-anchor Bryant Gumbel inaudible.

Still, the top-ranked network continued broadcasting without interruption and spokeswoman McClain Ramsey denied there had been any "major problems." NBC said it trained management and non-union employees to do the strikers' work. "To the contrary," she said, "everything has been quite smooth."

Members of the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians struck the network at 12:01 a.m. EDT after last-gasp negotiations failed and NBC put its final contract offer into effect.

Picket lines went up outside NBC headquarters in New York and at network facilities in Burbank, Calif.; Chicago; Cleveland; San Francisco and Washington.

Gore begins race, emphasizes youth

CARTHAGE, Tenn. — Sen. Albert Gore Jr. began his campaign for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination on Monday, standing in the brilliant sunshine on courthouse steps to declare "we no longer have the luxury of waiting" to face the challenges of the future.

The 39-year-old politician from the rolling hills of middle Tennessee declared that a "young and eager and restless nation" is ready to elect him the youngest president in its history — just as it was in 1960.

"Twenty-seven years ago, the voters of America, looking for the strength and hope of a new generation, replaced the oldest man ever to serve in the office of the presidency with the youngest ever to be elected to that office. I believe they are ready to do so again," he said.

In 1960, the voters picked John F. Kennedy to follow Dwight D. Eisenhower. If elected, Gore would be 40 on Inauguration Day 1989, succeeding Ronald Reagan, the oldest man ever to occupy the Oval Office.

Pentagon to send tank to Egyptians

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration is negotiating final details of a plan to allow Egypt to assemble U.S.-made components of the American M1-A1 main battle tank, officials said Monday.

"We have decided in principle to assist Egypt in some form of co-production of the M1-A1 tank but the modality and details have not yet been decided," said State Department spokesman Charles Redman.

Board to examine Sunday beer sale

TOPEKA — The Kansas State Fair Board may authorize Sunday beer sales on the fairgrounds this year, assuming requirements such as minimum food sales and local government approval are met, Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Monday.

In a non-binding legal opinion for Robert Gottschalk, executive secretary of the fair board, Stephan said sales of 3.2 percent beer fall within the scope of activities the board is empowered to regulate on the 280-acre fairgrounds in Hutchinson.

The 1987 Legislature provided for Sunday beer sales only in places where the practice has been approved by city or county governments and only in businesses that have at least 30 percent of their total sales in food. Hutchinson city officials approved of Sunday beer sales earlier this year.

"There is little doubt that the board may allow the sale of cereal malt beverages on Sunday if the requirements of (the legislation) are met," Stephan said.

The attorney general added that there is no general prohibition on the sale or consumption of 3.2 beer on state property.

Reagan reviews list of court candidates

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan and key advisers reviewed a list of possible candidates for the Supreme Court on Monday as administration leaders tried to play down the importance of political ideology in selecting a successor to retiring Justice Lewis F. Powell.

One senior administration official said he "would just be shocked" if the nominee weren't Robert H. Bork, a strongly conservative federal appeals court judge here.

The 30-minute meeting in the Oval Office ended without any announcement of a nominee. White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said a decision was not expected Monday but could come quickly.

"This is the kind of thing where opinion can coalesce behind a candidate, and the president says, 'This is the person I want and then — do it.' That can occur very fast," Fitzwater said.

In a surprise announcement Friday, Powell, 79, said he was leaving the court after 15½ years because of health problems and his age.

White House legal advisers, working over the weekend, prepared a summary for Reagan of legal opinions and positions taken by potential candidates for the high court.

Reagan discussed potential candidates with Attorney General Edwin Meese III, chief of staff Howard Baker and presidential counsel A.B. Culvahouse. Afterward, Meese left the White House without commenting to reporters.

People widely mentioned as likely candidates include Bork, Republican Sen. Orrin G. Hatch of Utah and two other appeals court judges, Robert A. Posner of Chicago and J. Clifford Wallace of San Diego.

"I would just be shocked if it wasn't Bork," said one senior official.

"The last time it was (Justice Antonin) Scalia and Bork that went into the president as being equally sound and confirmable," said the official. "Regardless of what Meese or Baker thinks, the president's natural inclination is going to be: 'Why not Bork?'" The official, who refused to be identified, acknowledged he was merely speculating about a nominee.

Democratic leaders, fearful of a conservative takeover of the court, have urged Reagan to name someone similar to Powell, who avoided the rigid ideology that at times split the court's liberal and conservative wings. Powell cast decisive votes on abortion rights and affirmative action and at the same time voted conservatively on law and order issues.

The eventual nominee is subject to approval by the Democratic-controlled Senate.

"We're replacing the pivotal member of the Supreme Court," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., a member of the Judiciary Committee that will review the nomination.

During his 6½ years in office, Reagan has appointed Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Scalia to the high court and promoted William H. Rehnquist to chief justice.

Fitzwater said candidates would not be judged on their stand on abortion, which Reagan opposes. "There are no specific issues that will be litmus tests," he said.

Meese stressed the same point in a speech in Chautauqua, N.Y., earlier Monday.

"We don't have any test. We don't care about the political or ideological allegiance of a prospective judge," Meese said. "We are concerned about how they view the Constitution and how they view their particular responsibilities as a jurist."

The comment drew laughter from many in the audience of about 3,000 people.

Graduate School's planning emphasizes current strengths

By KIM ZOLLMAN
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This is the fourth in a nine-part series dealing with the five-year plan for the University's colleges.

The Graduate School's response to President Jon Wefald's planning charge is different from other school's because the school operates through the other colleges, said Robert Kruh, dean of the Graduate School.

"The planning structure corresponds to eight colleges," Kruh said.

"(Research) is part of our mission. (It is) what makes an institution a true university," he said. "(It is) not a part of our University that's very visible but (it is) very substantial."

The key areas the school wants to emphasize are:

- Biotechnology, especially genetic engineering;
- Computer-controlled automated engineering technology such as robotics;
- The wheat genetics center with some funding by the state;
- Ways to develop food processing in Kansas;
- Material science such as fiber ceramics, which is stronger than steel, laser techniques and ion implementation; and
- Cancer research with additional instrumentation and computer capabilities.

"(These) are already existing strengths," Kruh said. "It's a matter of enriching and enhancing them."

The school's budget is $35 million to $40 million with $20 million brought in by faculty through competitive grants. The rest is provided by state and federal funds.

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

However, the Graduate School does not have enough because research is expensive. Even states not financially well off like Iowa have put more funding into state education while Kansas has not, Kruh said.

"We're losing ground" on personnel and equipment maintenance. Researchers should be able to compete for grants with Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge or Ohio State University-Columbus, and there is no equipment budget to update instruments, he said.

"People and the things people work with are what it's all about, and we're so far behind (other states)," he said.

The plan represents what the school and University "can and should become." It gives a sense of purpose and attempts to convince the state to invest in education rather than funding just to cover expenses. It also tries to convince the state there is a substantial long-term payoff, Kruh said.

The school's main responsibilities are handling admissions and programs of master's and doctoral programs with research as a mode of learning and moving forward in research and scholarly work.

"The University has very extensive research programs carried by the grad school," he said. "Strategic planning identifies specific areas of excellence."

The school's primary purpose is to "contribute to the body of knowledge," Kruh said. Its secondary purpose is reaping the economic benefits coming from new knowledge, such as how to prevent respiratory diseases in cattle to save money, he said.

Several programs include more than one college. The plan is, "a series of emphases through the grad school implemented through other colleges," Kruh said.

The Graduate School has a "catalytic responsibility" between more than one college in some programs, he said. For instance, the Center for Aging program encompasses five or six colleges.

But carrying the strategic plan through is, "the responsibility of the colleges," Kruh said.

There was timidity to cutting programs, he said. But it is sometimes necessary to "phase out, phase down" a program to enrich other areas rather than "putting it back in the state treasury."

The planning process for the Graduate School did not have an overall faculty involvement, but rather was the product of the Strategic Planning Committee, he said.

Members name US Ecology to build waste disposal site

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After helping to call the shots in Kansas' vote for US Ecology as a developer for a regional low-level radioactive disposal site, Gov. Mike Hayden said Monday financial and liability questions must be answered before a contract is signed.

The governor issued the statement after the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact selected US Ecology, of Louisville, Ky., as the developer for a five-state waste disposal site.

Kansas' vote was pivotal in the commission's 3-2 decision in Oklahoma City to reject a proposal submitted by Westinghouse Electric Corp. of Madison, Pa.

"The Westinghouse proposal was weaker in both the areas of financing and assumption of liability on the part of the developer," Hayden said in a statement distributed at the Kansas Capitol.

The Kansas representative joined with delegates from Nebraska and Oklahoma to back US Ecology. However, a spokesman for Hayden said Stanley Grant, secretary of health and environment and Kansas' voting member on the compact commission, consulted with Hayden before casting his vote.

Bruce Ney, the governor's assistant press secretary, said Hayden, Grant and key members of the governor's staff reached a consensus to support US Ecology during a telephone conference call over the noon hour.

Hayden said the next step in contracting with the developer will be for each state to appoint a member of a contract negotiating team.

"The exact financial conditions and liability questions will need to be answered by the developer before any contract is signed," Hayden said.

Doubts have lingered about US Ecology's solvency because it is facing a $97 million lawsuit in Illinois stemming from its operation of a 20-acre waste site near Sheffield.

A consultant selected 18 counties in northern Kansas as possible locations. Another 10 sites were identified in Nebraska, two in Arkansas and one in Louisiana. No site was listed for Oklahoma.

The developer is expected to make a final choice and does not have to pick a site from among those recommended by the consultant.

The companies said some of the liability questions would have to be worked out in negotiations with the compact and with the state selected as the site for the dump.

Both companies said they could not get into specifics on liabilities because they didn't have attorneys present and because they weren't able to cover in their applications all the possible scenarios for the site.

Both companies said they expect the project to cost about $10 million in startup costs.

US Ecology said its proposal calls for a grant of $10 million from the compact.

Westinghouse said it originally expected the host state to provide a bond issue for the $10 million. If that was not available, Westinghouse said it probably could arrange a loan through its own credit corporation.

Westinghouse and US Ecology also said they expected a governmental regulatory body to oversee their rate-setting policy.

Jim Wright of Westinghouse said decisions on how his company would address the issues of gross negligence and other financial responsibilities would have to be spelled out in a contract.

But Wright said Westinghouse intended to take out "the maximum amount of insurance available for liability." He said insurance at other facilities Westinghouse operates includes coverage for disposal of nuclear waste.

He said that if insurance was not available Westinghouse would expect to be liable for any "gross negligence." However neither Wright nor Rich Paton of US Ecology could say exactly what limited or gross negligence would involve.

"We're working under the assumption that insurance will be available," Paton said. "We'd have to look at definitions of what that would be."

Sandinistan government is communist

During the four years I've been going to school here, I've had to endure reading many articles and letters in the Collegian that I strongly disagreed with.

I've always wanted to write in a rebuttal, but I never felt confident enough with my knowledge of the topic at hand to provide a convincing case. I finally decided to arm myself with some facts in the event that another of these articles appeared. It just so happens that one of these articles appeared in the June 16 issue of the Collegian. I decided I could no longer keep silent.

The article, "Priest to organize Kansas opposition to aid for Contras," really left a bad taste in my mouth. Not only was the article filled with inaccuracies, but it showed me just how unwilling some people are to look at both sides of the situation in Nicaragua.

A good example of this was Moynihan's statement that "Nicaragua is not communist," and that "...the Marxist-Leninist political party would not sign the constitution." What Father Moynihan isn't aware of or just neglected to point out was that there are actually two factions of the Marxist-Leninist party in Nicaragua.

One of them is the traditional Communist party and the other is the Sandinista party (FSLN). In the early 1960s, the Sandinistas broke away from the main Communist party because of a disagreement. Both parties are Marxist-Leninist to the core.

The Sandinista government is run by a nine-man National Directorate. Its members, who include Daniel Ortega and Tomas Borge, are committed Marxist-Leninists. Nicaragua is closely aligned with the Soviet Union and the rest of the eastern-bloc nations.

For instance, the first month after the Sandinistas came to power they signed a military agreement with the Soviet Union. For those of you who think that the U.S. government drove the Sandinistas into the arms of the Soviets, consider this: at the same time the Sandinistas signed a military agreement with the Soviets, the Carter administration offered arms and training to the Sandinistas. The offer was refused, although they did accept economic aid from us.

BRYAN JONES

Nicaragua receives anywhere from $500 million to $1 billion annually in aid, most of it military, from the Soviet Union. Nicaragua currently has around 3,000 military advisers from eastern-bloc nations, most of them Cuban. When the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan, a United Nations resolution voted 120-12 in favor of condemning the Soviet invasion. Nicaragua was one of the 12 countries that stood behind the Soviets. The Sandinistas have also supported the Soviets in their stand against the Solidarity movement in Poland.

In Nicaragua itself, many basic freedoms are severely restricted. For instance, Nicaragua has only two daily newspapers. One of them, La Barricada, is a government paper and the other, Nuevo Diario, is a pro-Sandinista paper. The only opposition daily paper, La Prensa, was shut down. All of the television stations and most of the radio stations are state-owned. The only ones not state-owned are heavily censored by the government.

Political suppression is also evident in Nicaragua. There are 5,000 to 10,000 political prisoners in the country, which has a population of only about 3 million. There are other political parties in Nicaragua, but they get little coverage in the Nicaraguan press. The coverage they do get is generally negative.

Finally, what I consider the most despicable of all, is the government's persecution of religious groups. The government has, for example, oppressed the Mishito Indians. The Mishitos are a very religious people who have traditionally lived independently of the Nicaraguan government. The Sandinistas seized control of all Indian land and resources. Indian leaders were arrested and people were forced by the thousands to leave their villages. They were placed in relocation camps, where they were used as slave labor on plantations.

The Catholic church has suffered persecution at the hands of the government. Open-air masses are prohibited, priests have been arrested, churches have been closed, and students in seminaries have been taken out of school and forced to join the Sandinista army. Protestants have also been arrested and cruelly interrogated, and the small Jewish community has received similar treatment.

The only church in Nicaragua that isn't persecuted is the Sandinista-controlled Popular Church. Priests from the Popular Church base their beliefs on liberation theology, which teaches social and political reform based on Marxist theory. They teach that the revolution is God and that the Sandinistas are the saviors of Nicaragua. Priests within the Popular Church and those in government positions have been suspended by the Pope. They are not allowed to conduct the sacraments for the Catholic church.

Refugees from Nicaragua have told of some of the atrocities committed by the Sandinistas. People were forbidden to attend church, women and girls were raped by Sandinista soldiers, and whole groups of people were machine-gunned to death or buried alive.

I realize the Contra rebels have also committed atrocities, and I believe this is just as deplorable as the Sandinista atrocities. But improvements have been made in the situation. The problem is that many civilians in small villages have dual roles. The local doctor may also head the local militia and the local hospital may also be used to store weapons. So when the Contras, whose main goal is to free their country and create a democracy, attack a village, the government will claim a civilian doctor was killed and a local hospital was destroyed, while the Contras claim a militia leader was killed and a weapons stockpile destroyed.

Many people have visited Nicaragua and come back feeling positively about the Sandinistas. The problem is that they have been taken on a guided tour and the government has let them see only what they wanted them to see.

I challenge readers to listen to both sides and then make an objective decision for themselves. The Institute on Religion and Democracy in Washington, D.C., is a good place to contact for more information.

More funds for library should be top concern

The announcement last week that Farrell Library is undergoing a financial crisis brings up a seemingly unending problem at this University.

All people should know the importance of a library to a college or university, but at the same time few seem willing to take much action to ensure that Farrell receives the funding necessary to keep its facilities and collections current.

The 3,000 books lost to Farrell's collection in this recent financial problem will never be re-ordered, said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

Furthermore, Hobrock said the library needs to continue ordering expensive foreign serials because faculty and students need these to conduct thorough and scholarly research.

While the $100,000 President Jon Wefald allotted demonstrates his concern about the situation, it seems clear administrators need to find some way of guaranteeing the library a larger budget.

Why not Garfield?

Editor,
There are those here on campus who live to read Garfield! It is bad enough that the Collegian comes out only on Tuesday and Thursday. But it is atrocious that you actually publish a newspaper without a few words from Garfield! The intelligent section of the paper is getting pretty thin now that it only includes Bloom County. Has Charlie Brown and Farside gone on vacation as well? We are desperately seeking Garfield!

Savings on books

Editor,
The article "Costs force library to cut book orders," in the June 25 Collegian cited reasons for rising costs.

A large part of these rises is readily avoidable, if only the library has imaginative leadership. Sometimes imaginative leadership has to be unorthodox.

All quotes refer to the article. "Farrell currently subscribes to 2,200 foreign serials at a cost of $485,033 (per year)." "Differential pricing occurs with foreign publishers. For example, a German publisher might set one price in marks for his local audience (in Germany), and another price twice as high in marks for the United States and Canada." "It's greed. They say the higher cost is to cover postage and delivery, but that's baloney," he (the library dean) said. "That is, it is not the real cost for postage, etc."

"99 percent of all foreign (serials) titles come from Europe." So send one of your aides to live in Europe and purchase them locally. This should save $242,516 per year.

Say one aide's salary is $30,000 (a fancy salary), and add another $12,516 per year for travel expenses in Europe (more than adequate). Subtracting these gives a net savings of $200,000 per year on foreign serials.

Now, on practicality. All of Europe is less in distance than the United States, and it has fast, comfortable rail/bus transport. The aide merely rents a mail box in each European country, collects the serials (weekly moving from country to country) and mails them here. You won't have a dearth of applicants for this cushy, exotic job for that salary — any "youngster" from here will do it on a one-year contract.

As for domestic serials and books, another form of differential pricing occurs: "Publishers charge libraries a great deal more than an individual on the premise that more people will see the publications." Have some library employee rent a mailbox in his or her name to receive your serials. The employee will be charged the rate for individual subscription instead of the much higher rate charged to the library. This will eliminate that extra charge by the publishers and will save the library a great deal of money.

Do the same for the 43,000 books bought every year by the library to eliminate extra charges leveled by publishers. The library will save tens of thousands of dollars a year.

Adding the savings on foreign serials, domestic serials and books in the way described above could save the library somewhere in the neighborhood of $609,999. This is six times more money than the $100,000 President Wefald gave the library toward the problem. With this money the library can buy more serials than it does now, instead of moaning that "next July we'll have to cancel serials."

Education could save society

"Americans have a technology fixation generally. Regarding health, their thinking is shaped by the polio paradigm, the conquest of disease by Dr. Salk's silver bullet. But America's principal public health problems flow from foolish behavior regarding eating, drinking, smoking, driving — and, with AIDS, abuse of the body, especially the rectum."

George F. Will

AIDS has become one of the most politically charged issues in America today. Because of the phobic attitudes toward homosexuality that characterize our country, a virus has become the focus of a host of debates about civil rights, sexual morality — and believe it or not — even national defense and nuclear disarmament.

In the column from which I took the quote above, Will tries to argue that the real issue is not how to cure AIDS or even how to prevent the spread of the disease, but who should be blamed for it. It is clear that he blames homosexuals. Now, I would have laughed at any attempt to argue that blame is the central issue — until I came across that first sentence: "Americans have a technology fixation generally." Frankly, I would wholeheartedly agree that Americans have a technology fixation, but I have to pause and reconsider by own reasoning when I see such a statement used to support a homophobic tirade.

With that paragraph Will is saying that instead of dealing with the moral issues of how people relate to each other, they want technology to provide a vaccine so that they do not have to make difficult moral choices. Ironically, I have had the same opinion about the entire Reagan Star Wars proposal to build a giant outer-space prophylactic. The idea is that with enough technology, we can make nuclear weapons obsolete. The very difficult moral problems of how human beings relate to each other politically and economically can be sidestepped at the same time.

JUSTIN PALMER

Guest Columnist

I am not a scientist and am not qualified to speak about the likelihood of either a viable space shield or an AIDS vaccine. But neither seems to have much pertinency to the near future, and so it seems that we must ask ourselves what kinds of difficult moral choices do indeed pertain to our sexual and to our sociopolitical behavior. If I have not made a convincing argument that AIDS is analogous to the arms race, let me say that I'm not entirely sure of the analogy myself. But the complaint about America's technological fixation should at least make one stop and consider. That Will supports Star Wars, and yet does not recognize that his own complaint — about America's moral spinelessness — is as applicable to Star Wars as it is to vaccines attests to Will's cheapness as a rhetorician.

But my chief concern is with the consistency of my own reasoning toward issues that directly affect human life. I will attempt to outline what is analogous and dissimilar between these two issues.

First of all, what if we did have the technology, and a vaccine and/or a viable space shield were in fact available? Would it not be morally imperative that we make use of that technology to save lives? This is a fair question, when one gets the impression that the right hopes that a vaccine will never be found, or that the hopes a space shield will never be developed. The answer is yes, of course it would be morally imperative to use that technological option. But does it follow from that hypothetical option that we should spend millions and billions of dollars on research in order to find that technology?

No, it doesn't follow; not when we should be spending money on public education about how to prevent the proliferation of AIDS and nuclear weapons. Spending limited money on such research is precisely what I mean by America's technology fixation. Generally, I am bothered by the idea of scientific research which is supposed to produce specific results, as opposed to research which is done for the sake of knowledge itself, allowing whatever resulting technology to come as it may.

How are AIDS and the arms race dissimilar? Homosexuality is one kind of sexual relationship, while the U.S./Soviet arms race is one kind of geopolitical relationship. But homosexuality is not in itself deadly, while the arms race is. I certainly don't agree with Will that, because of AIDS, we should be homophobic. Homosexuality is not in itself wrong, as Will tries to bully us into believing. But by the same token, there would be nothing intrinsically wrong with producing and deploying nuclear weapons, if such activity was not necessarily an incredible waste of human resources and a growing threat to all life on the planet. If homosexuality necessarily implied sexual intercourse, and if sexual intercourse necessarily implied death, as does the arms race, then Will's argument that homosexuality is wrong would hold water. But it doesn't.

The only moral connection between sexuality and AIDS is that AIDS is a lethal virus which necessitates that all people act responsibly in their sexual relations, so that the virus does not spread. But the relationship between U.S./Soviet polarity and the arms race is that one is a function of the other, and, therefore, that kind of polarized geopolitical relationship is necessarily immoral and intolerable. Responsible living thus requires limited sexual contacts, the use of condoms, and nothing short of nuclear disarmament.

A taste of nostalgia

'Rain' rocks at park

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reviewer

Rain, A Tribute to The Beatles, played at City Park Thursday evening in front of about 1,200 people. Just about everyone had a good time, even though Rain left something to be desired.

Music Review

The audience was made up of many different classes of people. There were punks with mohawks, bikers with Harley-Davidson shirts, young girls wearing too much makeup, businessmen-types wearing shorts and colored socks, a few 1960s imitators and a few 1960s leftovers.

Though there was an official 1960s costume contest, I conducted my own. The winner was a little girl, barely old enough to walk, with love-beads dangling below her chubby belly.

The amazing thing was that at any one point during the show almost everyone was singing along with the songs. Not just the people old enough to remember them, but children as young as four and five were belting out their own Paul McCartney and John Lennon imitations.

There was one frazzled, housewife-looking woman who was carrying around a little blond boy on her hip. As Rain did an acceptable version of "I Wanna Hold Your Hand," the woman reminded me of my mother and the boy of myself. My mom used to play her Beatles albums when she cleaned the house. The house got cleaned, and I fell in love with The Beatles. Suddenly it struck me what this whole silly concert was about.

It was not about how well Rain made the audience believe The Beatles were on stage, it was about how well the audience made themselves believe The Beatles were on stage. This concert was a mind trip — fueled not by chemicals, but by old memories, good rock 'n' roll and the disappointment that lurks in the heart of every Beatles fan who never got to see them live.

Because the audience did their part, the show was a success. However, Rain deserves little credit. I'm a purist at heart, and I don't believe imitation is the best form of flattery. Understandably, it is not easy to imitate one of the greatest musical groups ever, but they are the ones who said they could do it.

Their objective was to present The Beatles. Not just their music, but their entire personality. Never mind the little things like the bass player not playing left-handed, or their stupid stage antics. Rain was an average imitation of the Beatles.

The first set was good. They played all the early three-chord, Chuck Berry-style songs well. Their vocals sounded like The Beatles, though their accents were too thick. The group even sort of looked like the Beatles thanks to their perfection of the patented Beatles' head shakes.

The second set, consisting of songs from the Sgt. Pepper's album was interesting. It was not very good, but gave Rain credit for trying to do songs live that the Beatles themselves would not try in concert (The Beatles stopped doing concerts in 1966).

However, The Beatles knew something which Rain ignored. Those songs can't be reproduced live without a small orchestra. Substituting a synthesizer for real instruments was a shame. Not just because it somehow seemed musically unethical, but also because it sounded bad.

The third set was a little better than the second, but not as good as the first. The songs weren't as complex as the Sgt. Pepper's material, but not as easy as the early stuff. Furthermore, Rain lacks feeling. By the third set Rain just seemed to be going through the motions. But the audience held up their end of the bargain, and everything turned out all right.

In all fairness, it wouldn't have mattered if Rain had been better than The Beatles. They still wouldn't have been as good. That is the risk a band takes when they choose to imitate a great act. The audience is in love with the original, not the copy. However, because the original is not available, Beatles imitators, Elvis imitators and the like will always have jobs.

Despite the bad points, the Rain concert was a success. They left something to be desired — The Beatles.

Actors work to complete theater sets

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

The Summer Repertory Theater will open its 1987 season Wednesday night with the performance of Tina Howe's "Painting Churches." But the question is whether the sets will be completed on time.

Monday morning, the repertory actors were busy working in the scene shop in McCain Auditorium. They were asked to lend a hand with the construction and finishing work of the sets.

Jill Towsley, senior in theater at the University of Kansas, and Don Pfister, senior in radio and television, were gluing and stapling Styrofoam shingles to the exterior of a curved window unit to be used in "Painting Churches." After painting, the shingles will appear to look like lap siding, Towsley said.

"The window is a cut-away abstract," said Paul Craig, junior in theater and set crew member. "It is going to have a shingled exterior and a window seat on the interior."

Mathew Mazur, sophomore in theater, was busy working on three chairs for the set of "Tartuffe." He said they started construction on the sets June 1.

"We worked from 9 a.m. until 11:30 p.m. when we started," Mazur said. "And for the last week we have been working until between 1 a.m. and 3 a.m."

The set for "Painting Churches" is the set requiring the most work, said Megan Garner, senior in theater and props master for the summer season.

"We have a lot of detail work on this set to give it the old Victorian feel," Garner said as she upholstered a living room rocker for the set.

John Uthoff, associate professor of speech and technical director and scene designer for the summer series, said completion of the set design was running behind schedule.

"We are having to do things over there (Nichols Theater), and it's hard to supervise things here (McCain scene shop)," he said.

"Painting Churches" is the one we are having the biggest problem with," Uthoff said as he sat in his paint-speckled office. "The Victorian period needs more detail and trim work."

Uthoff said the delay in the sets' completion came from extra furniture construction needed for "Tartuffe" and "Painting Churches."

But "we're going to be OK," he said, regarding completion of the sets.

'Witches' displays morals, symbolism

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reviewer

"The Witches of Eastwick" is not a horror story. Well it is, but it isn't. It isn't even about witches and the devil. Well it is, but it isn't. Yes, the story and the characters are of an occult nature, but they represent something much more of this world.

Film Review

The movie uses its characters and story to discuss relationships between men and women, women and women and a woman's place in the grand scheme of things. Fortunately, even with all this lofty symbolism, it is still a funny movie.

The story takes place in a small New England town — a town so small that everyone knows what everyone else is doing. Cher ("The Sonny and Cher Show"), Susan Sarandon ("The Rocky Horror Picture Show") and Michelle Pfeiffer ("Grease 2") (I like to list people's greatest accomplishments. Wow, what a list!) play three women who have lost their husbands in one way or another.

Though lonely, they refuse to become helpless and jump on the first man who comes along. Instead, they get together one night a week and get toasted while keeping each other sane.

During one of these drinkfests, they brainstorm for the outline of the perfect man. Ironically, during that same time a man, Jack Nicholson (the original "Little Shop of Horrors") moves to town. He has what each woman is looking for, plus a desire or three of his own.

Here is where the symbolism comes in. The characters are stereotypical, but that is needed in order to stress the ulterior themes.

Cher is a widow who balances her life between her daughter and her sculpting. She represents every independent, headstrong woman. Yet there is a side of her that needs to lean on a man. She can stand on her own, but sometimes its nice to take a load off.

Susan Sarandon is a recently divorced musician/music teacher. She represents every timid woman who ever needed, but was afraid, to put a little passion into her life.

Michelle Pfeiffer is a deserted housewife who is now raising a litter of kids by herself and working for the local newspaper. All she really wants from anyone, be they male or female, is honesty.

Of course Jack Nicholson, in the role he was born to play, is the devil. He is the mysterious stranger. The man who can be anything to any woman. But there is a price to pay for his romanticism.

He represents the stereotypical womanizer — the guy many of the dudes in Aggieville fancy themselves to be. Though the women are looking for something different in their men, he manages to sweep them all off their feet. He utilizes a simple technique — one which men since prehistoric days have been using on "fabulous babes." He tells them what they want to hear. In return, all he wants is children and someone to care for him.

The relationships between Nicholson and the women signify just how much men and women need each other. Despite what many staunch feminists say, it is nice to have a man to lean on, or to bring out hidden feelings, or even to trust. And no matter what many boneheaded, macho fellas say, it is nice to have someone to take care of you sometimes.

The key to making it work seems to be balance. In the movie, when the women begin to depend on Nicholson too much, and when he starts demanding more from them, things fall apart.

I hope I'm not being pretentious, but I think this movie had a moral. By taking care of each other, a relationship is a partnership that can be made to work. (Yes, it sounds idealistic, but, hey, it is a movie.)

As if that weren't enough, the film praises women for their ability to give birth. Never mind that, in a sense, the women create Nicholson. Go ahead and ignore the fetus shape he takes on when they try to get rid of him. The fact that he can't make children, only the women can, is symbolism enough.

Now the symbolism is out of the way. What's left is a funny film with some ironic twists. It is not black humor, but it is not for the weak-stomached either. This movie has some of the most vivid puke scenes ever recorded on film.

Still, with all its morals, characters and humor, "The Witches of Eastwick" is not great. Maybe it had too many things going on at once, or maybe I just thought about it too much. Whichever it is, I cannot say it is a great movie. But I can recommend it.

Group interacts with audience

Rock band shows well-balanced sound

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

Last Friday night was the perfect setting for an Arts in the Park concert in Manhattan's City Park — not too hot and not too cloudy.

The entertainment, a rock 'n' roll band called Trip Shakespeare, may not have been perfect, but it was pretty darn good.

Music Review

Many very new, very young bands have a rough, uncultured sound, and tend to concentrate on only one aspect of their music, such as the lyrics, or one of the instrument sections. Such groups are imitative, trying to build success by copying the style of bands they admire. They don't seem to achieve an individual style for five years or 50,000 miles, whichever comes first.

The four members of Trip Shakespeare have been together for less than two years, said Matt Wilson, lead singer and guitarist. For a group that has been together for such a short amount of time, Trip has a remarkably well-balanced sound, style and show. The fact that the group was named Underground Band of the Year attests to the members' cumulative skills.

The performance Friday night was comprised mainly of original music from the group's first album, "Apple Headman." Wilson shared the vocals throughout the concert with his brother, Dan Wilson, on keyboard and guitar, and John Munson, bass guitarist. These three guys obviously did not decide to get together and begin screaming into microphones in order to be a rock band. The fourth member of the combo is the drummer, Elaine Harris, who performed with control and obvious skill.

One of the things which made the concert so enjoyable was the band's interaction with the audience, particularly through Matt, who did most of the talking. His song introductions were always a little more than the basic "this song is dedicated to..."

At one point, Matt asked everyone who ever lifted a box to earn a living to raise their hands. For the introduction to "Reception," he asked the audience to imagine receiving an invitation from the parents of "your one-time true love, the one you call 'Sweetpea,' inviting you to celebrate her wedding." When a woman in the audience began heckling, Matt invited her to the stage...for punishment. "Want a spanking? Elaine's got the hickory sticks."

It was obvious from the start that one of the band's strengths is the unique lyrics. In addition to the standard rock "ode to the opposite sex" sort of song, Trip included two particularly unusual songs in the concert.

The first was, appropriately, in the first set. Matt introduced the song. "This song focuses on the life of the lonely northern pike, a fish that dwells deep in the waters of the Minnesota lakes." The fish swims to the edge of the lake and observes two humans in a meadow, and soulfully, with the help of the band, pours out his thoughts.

The group's last song, encore notwithstanding, was also highly imaginative. The song had two parts,

Ticks increasing problem across state

By PEGGY SHANDY
Collegian Reporter

Although tick activity has been more of a problem than normal in some southeast and southcentral Kansas counties this spring and summer, tick problems are not a common occurrence throughout the state.

Kansas usually has relatively little trouble with ticks on livestock, said Donald E. Mock, associate professor of entomology and extension specialist of livestock entomology. Problems are most common in Oklahoma, Missouri and southern states.

Producers reporting tick problems during May were from Marion, Elk, Greenwood, Chautaugua and Wilson counties.

"Ticks of several species are around every year from late March through September," Mock said. "Depending on the year-to-year weather patterns, there can be a lot more ticks some years compared to others over a broad general region."

"Other factors can cause small given local areas to have higher numbers out of sync with the average."

Ticks are parasitic insects that attach themselves to warm-blooded animals and survive by drawing blood from the animal. They have neither wings nor antennae. To attach themselves to a host, ticks climb on the tips of grass or branches, hang on with two legs and wave the others in the air to catch on legs, clothing or fur as it passes.

As ticks usually inhabit brushy, grassy areas, abundant rainfall that causes an increase in vegetative growth also causes an increase in the tick population. The extra growth provides ticks with more shelter during the winter, Mock said.

Moist conditions the following spring are also favorable for tick survival.

A series of such years can cause a cumulative effect resulting in increased tick activity, he said.

"From my own experience, I think there are fewer ticks than other years in the Manhattan area," Mock said. "There hasn't been a dramatic increase. In fact, it might even be a little low."

But Dr. Casey L. Thomas, veterinarian at Flint Hills Veterinary Hospital, Junction City, said ticks are evident every year on domestic animals. Due to the previous mild winter, he said he noticed ticks earlier in the Junction City area this year.

Tick infestation of pets during the summer months can be prevented by keeping surroundings mowed and sprayed, Thomas said.

"Any sprays, powders or treatments must be used regularly to be effective," he said. "Collars by themselves are not necessarily effective."

Thomas said it is advisable after using a tick-preventative dip to make sure the dog is dry before allowing small children to touch it. Also, they should wash their hands after playing with the dog.

Although the peak infestation period of the year is over, people should still be aware of the problem and remain on the lookout for ticks, Mock said.

Besides being painful and irritating to animals, ticks can also transmit human diseases.

The American dog tick can transmit Rocky Mountain spotted fever and tularemia, Mock said. Carried from rabbits and other rodents, tularemia is a bacterial disease potentially fatal to humans.

'I have seen a few cases of tick paralysis, but I have seen many more dogs with ticks than dogs with tick paralysis.'

Dr. Casey L. Thomas

Symptoms or indications of tularemia or Rocky Mountain spotted fever are swollen lymph nodes, headaches, dizziness, weakness, nausea, discoloration around the wound or red spots in the palms or on the wrists or ankles, Mock said.

"Another problem attributed to ticks is tick paralysis," Thomas said. "This can occur in both animals and humans."

Mock said neurotoxin secreted in the saliva from certain species of ticks such as the Rocky Mountain wood tick can cause total paralysis if the ticks are not removed.

"I have seen a few cases of tick paralysis, but I have seen many more dogs with ticks than dogs with tick paralysis," Thomas said.

Tick paralysis in humans is less common because people find and remove ticks before they become harmful, Mock said.

"Ticks should not cause a panic," he said.

The best way to avoid possible illness from ticks is for people to periodically inspect themselves, their children and their pets for ticks, especially after walking through possibly inhabited areas, Mock said.

Long-sleeved shirts should be tucked into long trousers stuffed into socks or boots, he said. Hair should be covered or tucked under a hat and inspected after a person leaves an infested area.

Special attention should be given to the back of the head, shoulders, navel, and ear canals which are favorite attachment sites for ticks, Mock said.

When a tick bites, it pierces the host's skin and attaches itself with a tooth-like structure. Its saliva dissolves the skin around the bite and produces a secretion, cementing its mouth into the skin.

"In removing a tick, you should never grab the tick and squeeze," Mock said. "It injects any pathogen it may be carrying back into the host."

"If you break the tick and have a scratch, you can also contract any disease it may be carrying."

The tick should be grasped as close to the skin as possible with tweezers or forceps and pulled out with a slow, steady pressure. If the tick is pulled quickly or too far from the skin, it could leave the mouth parts still embedded in the skin.

"I recommend seeing a doctor if you suspect there is some of the tick still in the skin," Mock said.

Shopping center tries to fill space

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

In addition to the downtown mall — The Manhattan Town Center — Town East is another shopping center trying to fill its spaces with about 20 percent of the leasing area still vacant.

Although located near the new mall, most owners of Town East businesses said they view the mall as a benefit, not a deterrent.

"We'll adjust our store hours to stay open later than the mall stores so people can stop by on their way home," said Christine Chaney, manager of The Fashion Company.

The increase in traffic generated by the mall will bring people to Town East, as well, said Judy Goodson, owner of The Hair Affair.

As the downtown mall nears its scheduled completion date of Oct. 26, there will be more leasing activity, said Chris Curtian, developer of Town East.

"We're excited about it. It has demonstrated success so far," he said.

Curtian said Town East was built with three ideas in mind:

— It would be a place for relocating downtown businesses which moved to provide space for the downtown mall.

— It would benefit west Manhattan businesses wishing to be closer to the downtown mall and businesses new in Manhattan, he said.

— It is a level site with easy access to a frontage road, a high volume of drive-by traffic and the close proximity of a major discount store and grocery store.

Steve Martinez, manager of Rentway Inc., said many men come in to look in his business while their wives are shopping at Food 4 Less. However, Martinez is skeptical about the downtown mall.

"I think it's coming too soon for the area," he said.

Marlene Ferlemann, owner of The Abundant Life Bookstore, said Town East stores are diverse, including Shop Quik, The Fashion Company, The Piano Shoppe and Mutual of Omaha. This diversity and the proximity of K mart and Food 4 Less are two of the drawing cards bringing customers to Town East.

"A lot of people go to Food 4 Less or K mart and then investigate the rest of it," she said.

Ferlemann also credited the attractive appearance and excellent night lighting to drawing customers to Town East.

"The lighting helps hold crime down and encourages evening shopping," she said. "It's a very well put together, attractive shopping center."

Economist urges retraining over commodity programs

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Instead of spending billions on commodity programs, the government should buy surplus land and help farmers move into other jobs, economist Lester C. Thurow said.

"Those in farming and related industries should be retrained and relocated, voluntarily, of course, to areas where jobs are available," said Thurow, the newly appointed dean of the Sloan School of Management at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"The sum that we now spend on farm subsidies would go a long way toward paying for such programs."

In areas of marginal production, Thurow said, entire farms should be purchased and permanently retired. The government has been operating a "whole-herd buyout" program for dairy cows in an effort to curb surplus milk production, and "there's no reason why we can't do the same for land," he said.

Thurow made his comments in an article, "Time to Retrain the American Farmers," in the current issue of Technology Review, an MIT publication.

What Thurow recommends would sanction an official policy much of the attrition that has occurred in agriculture over many years. The number of farms has been declining, people have been moving off the land, and small-town America built on local agriculture has been fading since at least World War II.

"To do what we do now — pay farmers not to produce — is to pretend that at some point in the not-too-distant future these farmers and their land will go back into production," Thurow said. "This sort of system discourages the very transitions that must be encouraged."

Thurow said a system of transitional aid for farmers and surrounding communities is the "only one realistic option" available to policymakers.

"This option, of course, is not attractive politically since those who would be aided by such a program don't want to leave farming," he said. "Furthermore, those who represent farmers don't wish to see them leave."

Thurow said most of the underdeveloped world has benefited from improved technology used to produce more food. Many of those countries, such as Pakistan, can now feed themselves.

"In nations that are not self-sufficient, such as the Soviet Union and countries just south of the Sahara, the problem is clearly one of efficiently organizing and distributing agricultural products," he said. "It is not a question of knowing how to grow enough food."

Thurow said the wealthy countries also have made large gains, noting that Europe in a decade went from importing 25 million metric tons of grain per year to exporting 16 million tons. Foreign grain production in the 1980s increased by 29 million tons per year, yet global consumption rose by only 19 million tons annually.

Hayden speaks to veteran group; dedication of memorial draws near

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

As the only state memorial for all Kansans killed or still missing in the Vietnam War nears dedication ceremonies, Gov. Mike Hayden spoke to about 75 people at the North Central Kansas Chapter of the Vietnam Veterans of America in Junction City last Thursday.

Hayden praised the memorial honoring 758 Kansans who lost their lives and the 38 listed as missing in action in Vietnam. The memorial, which cost $70,500, was completed last week in the city's downtown park at Sixth and Washington streets.

Hayden will be the keynote speaker for the dedication ceremony Saturday beginning at 1 p.m.

Jim Atkins, Vietnam veteran and chairman of the Kansas Operation Memorial, described the two years' work of planning and preparing for the erection of the granite and limestone edifice.

"I thought the fund raising would be the hardest part of this. I came to find out that getting ready for the dedication is, actually, going to be the hardest," he said.

"We're working 18 to 19 hours a day," Atkins said. "But it is a reality

now. It's no longer a dream, and July 4, two years, exactly, to the day that we started this we're going to dedicate it, and it's going to be a very emotional ceremony."

"Junction City should be very proud of this. It's going to attract a lot of people here, not just on July 4, but for years to come."

Klugman Monument Co. President Sam Klugman, builder of the memorial, complimented Atkins, Chip Mathis and Orville Nelson, whose initial efforts brought about the memorial.

"Three of the finest young men I've ever known," Klugman said. "They'll do anything, and anything they tell you they'll do is done. That's why this (the memorial) is here today, because they got an idea, they were dedicated, they didn't drop the ball."

Also taking part in the ceremony will be Junction City Mayor Mike Fegan; Fort Riley commander Maj. Gen. Leonard P. Wishart, III; Brig. Gen. Myrna Williamson, III ROTC region commander; and "Pete" Coors, of Adolph Coors Co., Golden, Colo., primary sponsor for the monument.

Although Hayden's announced purpose was to discuss the upcoming dedication, Hayden spoke about the nuclear waste issue.

The governor was asked why there was any consideration to having a low-level nuclear waste dump in Kansas in the first place.

"Nuclear waste is generated at hospitals, where we have nuclear medicine, especially in cancer treatment," Hayden said. "It is generated on our universities, both at Kansas State and at KU. It is also used in manufacturing."

"Since the inception of Wolf Creek (in Burlington), we have had a nuclear power plant in Kansas. What we have been doing, in essence, is dumping our nuclear waste on someone else."

Congress has created some new ground rules regarding low-level nuclear waste dumps, he said.

"In 1980, the Congress of the United States said it is not fair for all the 47 other states to dump their waste in these three states (Washington, Nevada and South Carolina), and they gave the other states so many years to provide for their own waste," Hayden said.

"In Congress' mind, it would be easier to clean up 10 sites than 50 sites if we have to clean them up," he said.

Federal law requires Kansas to be in a waste compact with other states.

Sailing the day away at Tuttle

It was smooth sailing for several students last weekend. With Union Program Council and the Kansas State Sailing Club, several students got a taste of sailing and learned a few fundamentals of the art.

The UPC Summer Program Committee coordinated a sailing trip with the sailing club. For $10, students were able to spend the day sailing at Tuttle Creek Reservoir with lunch provided. Brad Stowe, senior in marketing, and Aaron Henrichs, senior in elementary education, members of the sailing club, demonstrated basic sailing techniques Saturday and Sunday.

The trip offered interested participants the chance to experience sailing at a minimal cost before investing on their own.

Gwen Overmiller, a K-State graduate, said she has always been interested in sailing. When she was attending K-State, she had read about similar trips but never could attend them. The trip last weekend gave her and her husband Mitch, also a K-State graduate, the chance to go.

"I'd always wanted to learn to sail, but I didn't have the time when I was in school," Gwen said. "It's a lot harder than it seems."

David Britton, graduate student in computer science, had some past knowledge of sailing and has also been interested in learning more.

It doesn't require a lot of time to learn how to sail, Stowe said.

"People fall into two categories," he said. "There are the people who have a knack for it and pick it up in a few hours. Then there are others who have to work harder at it."

Students and faculty are eligible to join the sailing club. Membership dues for the summer are $30 for single membership, $40 per couple and $45 for family membership. Individuals interested in joining the club should contact the Activities Center in the Union.

It is not necessary to know how to sail when joining the club because sailing lessons are given. Once a member has successfully learned how to sail and passed a test on sailing knowledge, members obtain free access to the boats and a key to the facilities at the Blue Valley Yacht Club.

Sailing club is a member of the Blue Valley Yacht Club, Central State Sailing Association, and the Southeastern Intercollegiate Sailing Association.

"I think the trip was beneficial for both the sailing club and UPC because a lot of people had an opportunity to experience something that they wouldn't have gotten to experience otherwise," said Lydee Hawkins, senior in elementary education and trip coordinator for UPC.

Hawkins participated in the sailing trip and said it was quite a learning experience for her.

"We ran the boat," she said. "I have never sailed before. Given a couple more practices, I feel I could take it (the sailboat) out on my own."

Hawkins said the sailing club was excited about offering the sailing trip and hopes to do it again in the future.

The club competes in several races during the year. Four are scheduled here, with others being around the state. Stowe said two regattas between the University of Kansas and K-State are held during the summer.

In addition to the races, the club has a spring Bahamas cruise each year on which members are eligible to go at a low cost.

Role of college sports focus of NCAA talks

By The Associated Press

Abolishing football bowl games and post-season basketball tournaments may be the only way to rid college athletics of a continuing morass of scandal, Chancellor Ira Michael Heyman of Cal-Berkeley told NCAA convention delegates Monday.

University of Oklahoma president Frank Horton, representing big-time sports in the first-ever national forum on the place of college sports, said athletics will continue to be "an integral part of higher education."

The forum was the brainchild of the reform-minded NCAA Presidents commission and was prompted by continuing recruiting and academic scandals and sharp philosophical differences which have developed between academicians and administrators. It is planned as an 18-month program leading to possibly far-reaching changes at the 1989 NCAA convention.

Heyman hammered away at what he termed "abuse after abuse."

"We have seen recruiters who bribe high school students, staff who alter transcripts and test scores, admissions officers who admit athletes who are functionally illiterate," he said.

"It is hypocritical," Horton said, "to believe that a college or university with a very visible athletic program is somehow less interested in the quality of its academic programs. Many universities have shown that it is possible to be a premier educational institution and produce competitive, nationally recognized athletic teams.

"Without athletics, we would destroy a symbolic expression of the merits of discipline...of the value of achievement...of the importance of striving toward excellence. Athletics is a character-builder. Athletics can and do play a role in the education of students."

"Students can benefit immensely from athletics," Heyman said. "The lessons they learn about teamwork, discipline, standards of achievement, winning and losing can help them throughout their lives. And athletics can be joyful and reviving."

'Being big and successful does not mean corrupt.'

—Bo Schembechler

"Still, we also know that our athletics programs have not been all that they can be. We have seen one abuse after another. In too many instances, at too many places, we have created a world in which athletic concerns dominate educational concerns."

Many observers believe the national forum may bring to light such profound differences that the NCAA could eventually be split. Heyman, a key member of the Presidents Commission, said many in college athletics have become calloused to corruption.

"We are not pleased, but also we are not surprised to hear of some coaches stashing players in local community colleges and having them take easy courses solely to get eligible," he said.

"We are not surprised to hear of some coaches ordering academic advisors to change failing grades. We are not surprised to hear basketball players say they played while high on cocaine. We are not surprised that Eric Dickerson said that he received money to play. It is a sad commentary — but we might have been much more surprised if he had said that he played for free."

Heyman, conceding his remarks would alarm and offend many delegates, suggested revolutionary change.

"We could call for the creation of minor-league farm systems for professional football and basketball and sever what has been called the 'unnatural link' between academics and athletics," he said. "By creating alternative paths, we could stop insisting that all aspiring professional football and basketball players become college students."

"We could change the way we distribute revenues from football bowl games and the NCAA basketball television package. We could do the unthinkable and abolish bowl games and post-season basketball tournaments."

One of six respondents to the main speakers, Michigan football coach Bo Schembechler, scoffed at the notion that only cheaters win in college sports.

"Being big and successful does not mean corrupt," he said. "Not at all. Revenue-producing is not a sin."

"Michigan football and basketball pay for the entire athletic program, men and women. And frankly, we're proud of it."

Bicyclists continue journey; Manhattan marks midpoint

By JEFF RAPP
Staff Writer

En route from San Francisco's Golden Gate Bridge to the Washington Monument, bicyclists competing in the McDonald's Race Across America and their crews caught a brief glimpse of Manhattan last weekend.

Beginning Thursday night just before 8:30 p.m. and continuing through the weekend, about 25 endurance cyclists and their support teams were expected to pass through Manhattan's east side at McDonald's, 815 N. Third St.

At 8:29 p.m., Mike Seicrest of Flint, Mich., breezed through Manhattan as the current leader of the 3,117-mile race. Seicrest, 34, has finished second in the race twice, but he has never captured first place.

The support crew of the sixth-place cyclist — David Heck, of Utica, Mich. — was available to provide a few details about the perils and rewards of a race across America for a first-time participant.

"He's certainly experiencing something he never has before, but this is a big goal in his life," said Heck's wife, Heidi. "He's trying to fight being tired and yet he wants to win, but his second goal is just to officially finish the race."

Upon arrival in Manhattan Friday at 1:26 p.m., Heck had traveled 1,803 miles, almost non-stop, averaging 90 minutes to two hours of sleep per day.

Jerry Pavlat, Heck's crew chief, said the cyclist's most frequent requests are for fluid and food, because of his rigorous riding schedule.

"He needs a lot of liquid and a lot of food. Those are the biggest requests. They are burning roughly 8,000 to 10,000 calories a day," Pavlat said.

Pavlat, who owns a cross-country cycle and ski shop in Mt. Clemens, Mich., said although Heck works 40 hours a week, he nevertheless trained by cycling 50 to 100 miles daily in preparation for the race across America.

Pavlat said Heck is averaging about 300 miles a day in the race, which is substantially more than his training distances.

Also present to support Heck on his cross-country trek was his mother, Mildred, who had some concerns for his welfare.

"He's having very good care, but sure, I'm concerned," she said. "In fact, the whole family is concerned."

"He has three sisters and a brother and a dad at home, so we're all concerned, but we're all happy he's attempting it, and I'm sure he's going to do his best. We're all backing him."

Through the painstaking journey and hours of sleeplessness, the cyclists are not even assured any reward for placing at the end of the race, said Tim Sturgis, race volunteer from Olathe.

"There was some prize money, but they're not sure whether that's still available or not," he said.

Task force sends plan to NAIA

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The NAIA is considering dividing colleges competing in men's and women's basketball and women's volleyball into divisions.

The NAIA's task force on divisions of competition submitted a report making the recommendation to the association's executive board last week. The recommendation calls for divisions starting during the 1988-89 season.

The recommendation would have to be approved by the voting delegates at the NAIA's annual meeting in March 1988. The only sport for which the association has divisions is football, where teams have been put into two classes since 1970.

Of the NAIA's 476 members, 430 sponsor men's basketball teams; 400 sponsor women's basketball teams, and 347 sponsor women's volleyball teams.

The executive committee also finished a plan for expanded football playoffs this fall. Each division will have 16-team postseason playoffs.

Royals win rain delay

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A balk, a passed ball and Bo Jackson's 16th home run in the bottom of the fifth inning gave the Kansas City Royals a 3-2 victory over the Minnesota Twins Monday night in a game called off rain.

The Twins, who lead the American League West by 1½ games over Oakland, lost their fifth consecutive game.

The game was called after a 1-hour, 33-minute rain delay, the second delay of the fifth inning. Play earlier had been suspended for 20 minutes.

All the damage off Minnesota starter Les Straker, 3-5, came in a seven-minute period between rain delays.

Straker, a right-hander who spent 10 years in the minors before making the Twins in spring training, coasted into the fifth with a one-hitter and a 2-0 lead.

Jim Eisenreich, who was forced out of pro baseball by a nervous disorder three years ago, doubled following a infield hit by Frank White. Both scored on Minnesota miscues, then Jackson followed with the game-winning solo homer.

New skills emerge through wallyball

By ELTON MAYFIELD
Collegian Reporter

Volleyball is a fun sport for some people, but for the person looking for a new challenge for their skills, there is wallyball.

Wallyball is essentially off-the-wall volleyball. It is played on a racquetball court, which is 20 feet wide and 40 feet long and has a wall 20 feet high. The game is played with a special net stretched across the court's width.

Wallyball combines the hitting, blocking and jumping skills of volleyball with the quick hand/eye coordination of indoor court games.

"If a person likes to play volleyball, they will probably like wallyball," said Steve Martini, director of intramurals. "Wallyball is a direct off-shoot of volleyball."

"I have played volleyball competitively for over four years," said Ryan Finney, senior in education. "I have found wallyball to be as exciting and even more challenging than regular court volleyball."

Unlike racquetball, handball or squash, wallyball is a team sport. Two, three or four people can play on a side.

Martini said wallyball was started eight years ago by Joe Garcia, a racquetball club manager in Calabasas, Calif. Wallyball was started as an intramural sport at K-State during the 1981-82 school year. Teams consist of two team members each for all the divisions. Men, women and co-rec intramural divisions are available.

Garcia registered the name "wallyball," designed and manufactured the nets and hardware, and arranged with AMF-Voit, a sporting equipment manufacturer in Santa Ana, Calif., to make a special blue ball. Made with a butyl-rubber skin that doesn't sting like leather, the wallyball is the same size and weight as a volleyball but is slightly softer.

People play wallyball in the same manner as volleyball. Teams score only when they are serving, and each team has three hits to move the ball over the net. Games go to 15 points. If a player touches the net or lands across its plane, the serve moves to the other team.

But unlike volleyball, players have walls with which to contend. A player serves behind a line three feet from his team's back wall. A serve or volley can hit either side wall but not the opponent's back wall. A team member can, however, bounce the ball against his own back wall.

Offensively, players can angle slams to hit low against side walls, making them almost impossible to return, Finney said. Serves can also be placed grazing close to the walls. Defensively, players can bounce the ball off the wall to teammates or to keep in play shots that go away.

Wallyball can only be played on racquetball court No. 1 at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, so reservations must be made for that specific court. Reservations may be made up to one day in advance, on a first-come, first-served reservation basis.

Cottonwood Fitness Center, 3615 Claflin Road, has two racquetball courts that are also set up for wallyball. In order to use these courts, membership to Cottonwood Fitness Center is required.

exercise," she said, adding that it is wise to exercise moderately when beginning a fitness program, so as not to exhaust the body.

"Now the students are aerobicizing for the right reasons and asking the right questions. They want to become fit more gradually," Halverson said.

People see a need to stay in shape because they look to the future. As the American population gains longevity, people see a need to keep their bodies fit and healthy, she said.

"Students are still being warned about gaining the 'freshman 10 or 15 pounds' when they come to college. As college students, freshmen have to watch their transition to college life. They may gain the weight because they reduce their exercise level and do not eat decent food," said Elizabeth Addington, a registered dietitian with a master's degree in foods and nutrition.

Students seeking trends

By LORI SIEGRETT
Collegian Reporter

The fitness craze swept the country in a whirl of exhausting video tapes, numerous exercise books and tight-fitting, flashy leotards.

Current fitness and nutrition trends across the country are reflected at K-State, said Joyce Halverson, assistant director of Recreational Services. A higher percentage of K-State students now want to know which foods are good for their bodies and which exercises will benefit them the most, she said.

More information is being produced every day for the nutrition-conscious person. Halverson said students are becoming more aware and sophisticated in their nutritional knowledge.

"Aerobics used to be just dancing to music. Instructors like Jane Fonda would emphasize 'going for the burn,' which is not a safe way to exercise," she said, adding that it is wise to exercise moderately when beginning a fitness program, so as not to exhaust the body.

"Now the students are aerobicizing for the right reasons and asking the right questions. They want to become fit more gradually," Halverson said.

People see a need to stay in shape because they look to the future. As the American population gains longevity, people see a need to keep their bodies fit and healthy, she said.

"Students are still being warned about gaining the 'freshman 10 or 15 pounds' when they come to college. As college students, freshmen have to watch their transition to college life. They may gain the weight because they reduce their exercise level and do not eat decent food," said Elizabeth Addington, a registered dietitian with a master's degree in foods and nutrition.

Addington gives nutrition counseling at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex through the Department of Foods and Nutrition. She said most students want advice as dieters or athletes.

Not everyone has the stamina to maintain a fitness program, Halverson said. Getting people to use the many services the Rec Complex offers is not hard. The challenge comes in convincing people to keep exercising.

People require motivation to continue anything they undertake, especially getting in shape. Exercising on a bicycle that seems to do everything for a person is a desirable way for students to work out, Halverson said.

These bicycles give the rider feedback with a computerized display on the handlebars, which lets the riders know the number of calories they are expending, heart rates, speed and the amount of time.

"These bicycles are more motivating because they almost talk back to you," Halverson said.

"There is a lot more interest in all our high-tech equipment. At the Rec Center, the computerized rowing machine and aerobic stair-climbing devices are growing in popularity," she said.

During the five years she has been here, Halverson said, there has been a growth in aerobic programming.

Several day sessions are offered during the school year. One class is offered during summer school, and it usually has 100 participants, she said.

"More men are aerobicizing now. Five years ago, they would just watch the aerobics classes from the weight room windows. Now we see more males joining in sessions," Halverson said.

Triathlons, combining swimming, bicycling and running, and biathlons, consisting of two of those events, are becoming more popular locally. Halverson said there used to be 60 to 80 competitors in the Little Apple Triathlon held every year at Tuttle Creek State Park. During the past three years, they have had to turn people away after setting the maximum number of contestants at 200.

"Ninety percent of the contestants live within a 50-mile radius," she said.

Of the many intramural activities, basketball is the most popular sport at the Rec Complex. Halverson said 375 teams participated in the tournaments sponsored by the Rec Complex last year. The sport's popularity is probably due to Kansas' winters, which force people indoors, and the fact that many students played basketball in high school.

It does not matter which sport a person chooses or how one keeps in shape, she said, as long as the individual remains active.

Soviet premier outlines U.S.S.R. economic illiteracy issue

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Premier Nikolai I. Ryzhkov spelled out Soviet economic ills Monday to prove drastic reform is needed to loosen the government's grip on industry. He warned opponents of change they will be fought "with all methods and means."

In a two-hour speech to the Supreme Soviet, the nation's nominal parliament, the premier said "mismanagement reigned supreme" in the past and "bureaucracy and formalism" threaten the future.

Ryzhkov disclosed that 13 percent of Soviet industrial enterprises ran in the red last year and that the state treasury paid $61.6 billion to cover industrial debts.

"We have to eliminate economic illiteracy. We have to amass new experience and share that experience with everybody," he told parliament on the opening day of its summer session.

The 1,500-member parliament, officially the nation's highest legislative body, will formally adopt next week the first measure of 12 contained in an economic reform plan championed by Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev and approved by the Communist Party leadership. The reform blueprint aims at forcing enterprises to become financially self-sufficient by revamping the system of pricing and supply, linking workers' wages to job performance, and curbing powers of state bureaucrats.

The plan represents a dramatic break from the state-financed "command economy" that has been the Soviet ideal since Josef V. Stalin's rule. Proponents say such an economy is necessary to increase productivity and improve the quality of goods.

Applause rolled through the high-ceiling hall of the Kremlin Palace as the Soviet leadership, led by Gorbachev and President Andrei A. Gromyko, walked to their seats. The session, the legislature's first since November, opened at 10 a.m.

Adoption of the draft law is expected when the deputies reconvene Tuesday for what is expected to be the final day of the session.

Speaking from a podium in front of a 20-foot-high statue of Lenin, Ryzhkov assailed the way the Soviet economy was run in recent years, saying "mismanagement reigned supreme" and gave specific examples.

He cited an enterprise which, because of state price-fixing, obtained an 800 percent price increase for its machine presses despite only doubling productivity.

But the premier saved some of his toughest criticism for the government apparatus he heads, saying the number and size of ministries became "bloated."

Ryzhkov raised the possibility that state organs could be eliminated under the reforms and said that in the Baltic republic of Estonia, plans were being considered to merge five ministries.

He criticized government employees loyal only to the interests of their department, and said the "new way of thinking finds its way ahead slowly."

He singled out bureaucracy and "formalism" in thought as the most dangerous enemies of reform, saying they would be fought "with all methods and means."

The deputies, many of them in state and party jobs that could be greatly altered or even eliminated by the reforms, were silent as Ryzhkov spoke. They applauded at the end, and the meeting was adjourned.

the May meeting. She said she had had problems with KCI bleach and window cleaner.

STATE STATUTE

After making three requests to the director of purchases, Denton was informed earlier this month that the KU Medical Center was granted an exemption from using the KCI wax stripper. Roach said that KU Medical Center is the only state agency which has been granted an exemption from using KCI floor products.

Roach and Ewell did not explain why the exemption was made.

Kansas Laws 75-5273 to 75-5282, known as the "Prison-made goods act of Kansas," require state agencies to purchase KCI products unless specifically granted an exemption by the director of state purchases or the secretary of administration.

Seely said he thought the main problem in being granted an exemption was that the director of KCI was in charge of granting or denying exemptions.

"That's kind of like the fox watching the hen house," Seely said.

Although the statutes authorize only the director of purchases and the secretary of administration to grant exemptions, Roach acknowledged he would probably not grant an exemption unless he had the approval of the director of KCI.

"We sit here in the middle and try to sort these things out," he said.

Bill Sesler, director of purchasing in the Controller's Office, said state agencies are required to purchase KCI products "whenever they meet our needs. The question is, when are they meeting our needs?"

COST COMPARISONS

Some K-State employees who have complained about KCI products have also voiced concerns about the cost of using KCI products. Sizemore said using KCI products cost more money because of increased labor costs.

Muehleisen said he was concerned about the cost of the products. He said although most KCI products cost about the same as commercial products, some KCI products cost more than commercial products. He said he could not understand why the products were this expensive because KCI's inmate labor costs, marketing costs and shipping costs should be minimal.

Ewell said while some KCI products may cost as much as similar commercial products, no KCI products cost more than those from private industry.

"We have become efficient enough to hurt private industry. We're cutting into private industry and the people at K-State want to continue buying from the same people they have been buying from," he said.

Norman Root, procurement officer in Physical Facilities, said he was unsure how the price of KCI products compared with those of private industry because the University does not have the opportunity to buy commercial cleaning products and, therefore, cannot compare prices.

"I don't know if we have any figures because we've had no choice in what products we can use. But I have no reason to think they are (overpriced)," he said.

SAFETY

K-State employees began using KCI's non-ammoniated wax stripper last year when several K-State employees became sick after using the ammoniated wax stripper. On June 5, 1986, John Lambert, director of Public Safety, issued a statement requesting that the KCI ammoniated wax stripper no longer be used.

Steve Galitzer, K-State industrial hygienist, said it has been difficult to determine the cause of the sickness because the Office of Public Safety has not received Material Safety Data Sheets from KCI. Galitzer said MSDS's are safety information sheets compiled by manufacturers and provided to consumers.

The Office of the Kansas Department of Health and Human Services said although private industries were required by law to include MSDS's with all products they manufacture, a state industry, such as KCI, is not required to do so.

Ewell said his staff was compiling MSDS's for KCI products and that they would be available "very soon." KCI has been inspected and approved for safety measures. "We're not trying to hide anything," he said.

"We're still not using the product and that's one reason the floors aren't looking as good as they used to," Galitzer said. "So far we've been lucky. No one has been hospitalized, but the time will inevitably come unless we get cooperation from KCI."

$3.50 for each additional gram. Controlled substance weights begin at one gram or ten dosage units for $200, said Cleo Murphy, chief of Kansas Sales Tax Bureau. Stamps will last for three months.

"All stamp purchases are confidential and cannot be used to convict anyone," Murphy said. "If someone is caught in possession of drugs without the stamp, not only is the tax imposed but a penalty of 100 percent of the tax is added."

Seat belts must be worn in vehicles newer than 1968, said Lt. Gary Grubbs, Riley County Police Department.

The RCDP will not stop drivers for not wearing seat belts but will issue $10 citations if they are stopped for any other violation and are not wearing seat belts at that time.

each of which was led off by another Matt-style introduction. Simply enough, it tells the story of an out-of-work Minnesota craftsman.

"Up in the north woods lived a toolmaster, a young toolmaster of Brainerd." The toolmaster worked at a creamery, but when he lost his job, he joined a rock band and goes south "for a change of scenery." The second introduction showed an obvious attempt to rhyme, at all costs. "While he was here, the toolmaster stayed at my house. The whole time he was as quiet as a mouse."

Of course, the band did have faults. Despite the technical excellence and creative lyrics, the tunes began to get a bit repetitive after awhile. The songs were all well-performed, but there wasn't a great deal of variance in style. A band made up of such obviously talented individuals should be able to develop more than one musical style.

On the whole, however, City Park was a good place to be Friday night. If Manhattan is lucky, the band will agree to come to town again in September as part of its fall tour.

The Fashion Company, one of 10 in a chain of Midwest stores owned by Great Plains Apparel, is right at home in Town East, Chaney said.

"All the Fashion Company stores except one are located in strip shopping centers. This is a really nice center compared to similar or older ones where we have stores," she said.

Goodson said she moved her business from downtown to take advantage of the parking and attractive layout of Town East.

Democrats promise to fight president on Bork's selection

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said today he will nominate Robert H. Bork, an appeals court judge known for his staunchly conservative views, to replace Justice Lewis F. Powell on the Supreme Court.

Reagan praised Bork's "outstanding intellect and unrivalled scholarly accomplishments" in making his selection. Even so, the 60-year-old Bork is certain to face a difficult struggle to win confirmation in the Democratic-controlled Senate.

If seated, Bork could be instrumental in helping alter some of the court's landmark decisions, such as a woman's right to an abortion and the principle of affirmative action.

Reagan called on the Senate to confirm Bork before the court's new term in October, but Democrats served notice they wanted to examine his qualifications thoroughly. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., a member of the Judiciary Committee, said, "The Senate is going to carry out its constitutional role...with probably more scrutiny than anything this decade."

Leahy said he could not envision Bork being confirmed before Congress' August recess. He said that with Bork on the nation's highest court, "his vote would determine that abortions would not be legal today. I think we have to take a look at that."

Bork is best known nationally for carrying out then-President Nixon's order in 1973 to fire Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox after two higher officials refused. At the time, he was Nixon's solicitor general.

Reagan called Bork a "most prominent advocate of judicial restraint."

He stood next to Reagan, without speaking, as the president announced his nomination in the White House press briefing room. Reagan also refused to take questions.

Attorney Gen. Edwin Meese III and Howard H. Baker Jr., presidential chief of staff, had carried a list of hopefuls to Democratic and Republican Senate leaders Tuesday in separate meetings.

The 60-year-old Bork was the top choice of hardline conservatives to succeed Justice Lewis F. Powell, 79, who announced last Friday he was leaving the bench because of health problems and his age.

In many cases, Powell was the swing vote in 5-4 decisions, including the landmark 1973 ruling affirming a woman's constitutional right to an abortion, as well as affirmative action programs and separation of church and state.

Bork once said that the Supreme Court's 1973 decision legalizing abortion was "a classic instance" of the court imposing its morality on local jurisdictions. He said abortion should be a matter of local control.

In addition to opposing abortion, Bork has complained that Supreme Court decisions have extended constitutional protections and federal authority far beyond their proper bounds.

In a 1982 speech, he sharply criticized high court decisions on abortion, sexual freedom, and many types of free expression.

Privately, White House officials said they expected a tough fight in getting Bork's nomination through the Judiciary Committee, and then expected a filibuster from opponents on the Senate floor.

The Supreme Court is in recess until October.

Any nomination for the Supreme Court is viewed as a major decision for the president, but this one took on added significance because of the pivotal role Powell played on the court.

Announcing Bork's selection, Reagan praised him as "a premier constitutional authority" and said, "His outstanding intellect and unrivaled scholarly credentials are reflected in his thoughtful examination of the broad, fundamental issues of our times."

Local club to become non-sexist

By LORI SIEGRIST
Collegian Reporter

Attorney General Robert T. Stephan, stated last week in an advisory opinion that all Kansas Rotary Clubs must open their membership to women.

Vernon Larson, president of the Manhattan Rotary Club, said he hoped to have women Rotarians in the Manhattan club by the end of this summer.

"Several women have been nominated," Larson said. People cannot apply for membership. Prospective members are asked to join. Then they must be classified and go through orientation.

Larson said the Manhattan Rotary Club has been interested in having women members for quite some time, but has been held back by an international barrier barring women from the club. The Duarte case in California brought down this barrier.

After a challenge from the Duarte Rotary Club, the California courts decided the clubs were subject to civil rights laws protecting against discrimination because they were organized for business purposes.

William Richter, professor of political science and a Manhattan Rotarian, has been outspoken in favor of this decision, he said.

"I have felt since I joined the club that it is absurd to have an all-male organization in the 1980s," Richter said.

"It is extremely unfair to exclude on the basis of gender. A decade ago, we fought against discrimination on the basis of race," Richter added.

He expects to have women Rotarians in Kansas within six months. The Manhattan club appointed a committee to draw up names of individuals who would be eligible. More than 60 names, he said, have been suggested.

Richter felt that women would strengthen the club, saying that diversity is one of the key aspects of the club. By not allowing women to join, he said, Rotary clubs were de-

Officials optimistic about middle-range missile agreement

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States and the Soviet Union, nearing an agreement to eliminate their medium-range nuclear missiles, still must iron out lingering differences over verification and other details, Reagan administration sources and a leading senator said Wednesday.

"This is a tedious process, but it is going well because both sides are motivated to reach agreement," said Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind.

Lugar, who met in Geneva last Sunday with U.S. negotiators, told The Associated Press, "I believe an agreement is impending with regard to the elimination of the 100 warheads" the Soviets have deployed in Asia.

The sources, who demanded anonymity, said the Soviets also had offered to remove the only other medium-range missiles in Asia — some 50 rockets with a range of 565 miles.

As part of the compromise formula, U.S. ground-launched cruise missiles and Pershing II rockets to be withdrawn from Western Europe could not be modified into other nuclear weapons, the U.S. official said.

He told The Associated Press that Col. Gen. Nikolai Chervov, a senior adviser to the Soviet general staff, had proposed the compromise two weeks ago in Geneva to U.S. negotiator Maynard Glitman.

It was designed to overcome obstacles to a treaty on medium-range missiles and subsequently was approved by the Reagan administration, the official said.

But Charles E. Redman, the State Department spokesman, said "we haven't reached an agreement — either formal, informal, in principle, handshake or otherwise."

He did not deny Chervov had suggested a compromise to Glitman. "Our negotiators are hard at work, they have discussed a number of ideas with their Soviet counterparts," Redman said.

Lugar said that among the unsettled issues was the schedule for phasing out the 316 U.S. missiles to be withdrawn from West Germany, Britain, Italy and Belgium, and the 883 Soviet missiles to be eliminated in Europe.

The senator said the United States wanted the missiles destroyed over three years, but the Soviets wanted a longer schedule. Also, Lugar said, because of their numerical edge, "the destruction by the Soviets of launchers and warheads must be fairly rapid in early stages to bring both sides into parity."

Indian healer to practice art

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

A Native American healer will teach Manhattanites healing through energy and prayer practices this weekend.

Arlene Morning Star was brought to town for the workshop by Manhattan residents interested in Native American ways and philosophies, said Pat Embers, one of those individuals.

There will be a free introductory lecture at 7:30 tonight at the UFM house, 1221 Thurston St.

Although promoted as a medicine woman, Morning Star said that is not a title she prefers because it does not imply humility.

"The medicine path is very sacred," she said. "First and foremost with Native Americans is humility. I just refer to myself as Arlene."

Morning Star said her healing is basically through the uses of energy, which is present everywhere.

"Energy is everything, and everything is energy," she said.

"God is energy, and God is everywhere. God can be called the Grandfather or any other name for a higher spirit."

Morning Star said the workshop will focus on the construction and uses of the Native American medicine wheel and crystal polarity therapy. The medicine wheel is used to focus energy for healing through the construction of stones, she said.

"My basic purpose is to heal Mother Earth," Morning Star said. "I am a healer, but the wheel will work even when I am not there. It will heal whatever God wants it to heal."

Crystal polarity therapy is a form of healing by balancing the male and female energies of the body, she said. Morning Star learned polarity therapy from two Native American teachers and combined her learning with the "higher guidance" she received.

"I use the crystal as a pendulum, bringing energy in from the Universe," she said.

Morning Star, who is part Mohawk and part Cherokee, was born in upstate New York and has had her gifts since birth.

"When I grew up, like many others I went to the city and became materialistic," she said. "I've only been back with the natural ways for the past 15 years."

The name Morning Star was not given to her at birth, she said. The name appeared in a vision to the Cheyenne tribe, and they gave her permission to use it when she divorced her husband.

Most of the people who attend her workshops, Morning Star said, are Anglo-Americans interested in learning about Native American spirituality.

"My personal theory is that interested Anglos were Native Americans in a previous life. Native Americans who follow the materialistic path are red apples — red on the outside and white on the inside."

Morning Star said in addition to the polarity therapy and medicine wheel, she will be teaching Chaldean astrology and Lakota prayer ties.

"Chaldean astrology is what the wise men used to find Jesus," she said. "It's not astronomy, because that has no spirituality. We use it to tell you the spiritual path of your life."

"The Lakota prayer ties are the prayer ties of the Sioux Indians. I'll teach people which direction they should pray to achieve a specific thing."

The workshop, which costs $56, will be at 733 Galaxy Drive. Embers said the crystal and polarity healing will take most of Saturday. The earth awareness and healing session, comprised of the medicine wheel and other ceremonies, will take place Sunday.

Hayden to honor Vietnam veterans

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

The Fourth of July holiday will begin a day early in Junction City.

Sidewalk sales in the downtown shopping area, picnics and Arts in the Park are part of Friday's kickoff festivities for the holiday.

The weekend's highlight will be the dedication of Kansas Operation Memorial, a 26-ton granite and limestone memorial honoring the 758 Kansas who were killed in the Vietnam War and the 38 Kansans still listed as missing in action.

Gov. Mike Hayden will be the keynote speaker and, along with other prominent dignitaries, will officially dedicate the memorial in the Uptown City Park at Sixth and Washington streets.

Standing with Hayden will be Junction City Mayor T. Michael Fegan; Fort Riley commander Maj. Gen. Leonard P. Wishart III; Brig. Gen. Myrna Williamson, commander of the III ROTC region; and Jim Atkins, Chip Mathis and Orville Nelson, the three veterans who conceived of and planned the monument and carried it to fruition.

The dedication ceremony will begin at 1 p.m. Saturday and feature Missing Formation, a fly-over by F-4 Phantom fighter jets to honor those who died in the conflict.

Now in its 11th year, the 10-kilometer Coors Freedom Run will be the first event on Saturday's agenda.

The 10,000-meter race is scheduled to start at 7:30 a.m. Saturday at the Milford Lake Dam, said Jerry Frakes, local Coors distributor and coordinator for the race. The race ends at Uptown City Park.

Registration deadline is 6:30 a.m. Saturday, but there is a $1 late fee for registering that day. Normal registration runs until 9:30 p.m. Friday at the Junction City Distributing Co., 530 E. Eighth St. in Junction City, Frakes said. The entry fee is $6.

Hussein, officials honor Waldheim

AMMAN, Jordan — King Hussein Wednesday praised the "noble human values" of Austrian President Kurt Waldheim, who is emerging from a year of diplomatic isolation caused by allegations he helped deport Jews to Nazi death camps during World War II.

The king, Queen Noor and other members of the royal family gathered at Amman's military airport to welcome Waldheim on his second presidential visit abroad since he was elected president in June 1986.

Last week, Waldheim went to the Vatican for an audience with Pope John Paul II, rousing protests from Israel and Jewish groups around the world.

At a palace banquet Wednesday evening, Hussein praised the former United Nations secretary-general for what he called Waldheim's "patriotism, integrity and wisdom."

He said Waldheim's presidential election victory showed Austrians appreciated "the noble human values for which you stand."

Waldheim repeatedly has denied allegations of wrongdoing during his World War II service in the German army in the Balkans. He also has denied being ostracized by the international community, saying he has received invitations from Libya, Iran and other countries.

Ambassadors from major Western countries, including Britain, France, West Germany and Italy, appeared to greet the Austrian leader. But U.S. Ambassador Paul Baker did not attend.

U.S. thinks Iran laid mines in gulf

WASHINGTON — U.S. specialists operating from small craft removed between 10 and 12 mines they think were laid by Iran near Kuwaiti ports, and the Pentagon plans to send minesweeping helicopters to Kuwait to deal with any further threat, Reagan administration sources said Wednesday.

The mines "were Russian-made, and are believed to have been procured from North Korea," a leading supplier of arms to Iran since the start of the Iran-Iraq war nearly seven years ago, said a Pentagon source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

A State Department official, also requesting anonymity, said the mines were laid in the approaches to Kuwait's main port of Al-Ahmadi "relatively recently. And the indications were that they had been placed there by Iran."

The mines were moored with weights to the sea bottom, and were designed to float just beneath the surface and explode when struck, said the Pentagon source.

They were removed by an 18-member Explosion Ordnance Disposal team, operating from small craft, said the defense source. The craft are not counted among the six U.S. ships now operating in the gulf.

The Pentagon plans to supplement the team with MH-53D helicopters capable of removing mines, defense sources said. They declined to say when the copters might go.

Five die in crash of military plane

FORT BRAGG, N.C. — A C-130 cargo plane performing a tank-dropping maneuver crashed and burned on a dirt runway Wednesday, killing five servicemen but stopping 100 yards short of bleachers filled with spectators.

Four of six Air Force crewmen on the plane were killed, as well as an Army soldier on the ground, said Capt. Brian Irving of Pope Air Force Base, where the four-engine turboprop was based.

Irving said three crewmen were taken by helicopter to Womack Community Hospital at Fort Bragg, Sgt. Lori Cogan of the Fort Bragg Public Affairs Office later said one of those crewmen had died. The two surviving crewmen were being transferred to Brooke Army Medical Center at Fort Sam Houston, Texas.

Irving said the soldier killed on the ground was one of two men in a military vehicle hit by the plane after it skidded 1,000 yards down a dirt runway and into some trees. He said he did not know what happened to the second man.

The plane was displaying a technique in which a parachute is used to pull a tank or other vehicle out the rear cargo door while the plane is only a few feet off the ground, officials said. The maneuver, performed in front of a crowd including families of 82nd Airborne Division troopers, was part of a military exercise open to the public.

Irving said he did not know how many spectators were in the bleachers, which were designed for 5,200 people.

REGIONAL

Woodson County may accept waste

BURLINGTON — Southeast Kansas officials have expressed an interest in a proposed regional low-level radioactive waste dump as a way to help their economically troubled region.

In a Tuesday meeting with Gov. Mike Hayden, Anderson and Woodson County officials said they were willing to discuss locating a waste dump for the five-member Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact in their areas. However, they said they are interested only if Kansas is chosen as the host state for the dump.

Hayden said he favors putting the dump near the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant outside of Burlington in Coffey County because the plant is the state's largest generator of low-level radioactive waste. Anderson County is east and Woodson County south of Coffey County.

Brenda Maske, president of a non-profit economic development group in Yates Center in Woodson County, said county officials are interested in the waste dump.

"Anything that has this kind of economic impact is something we'd have to be interested in," Maske said. "We're out there looking for smokestacks. This isn't exactly a smokestack, but it's almost the same thing."

Indian recognized for aiding troops

FORT LEAVENWORTH — After 120 years, a Sioux guide who died with U.S. Army troops during the Indian Wars has received the recognition the military says he deserved.

Red Bead, who died in a massacre of an Army patrol in western Kansas, was honored Wednesday during a ceremony at the National Cemetery at Fort Leavenworth. Since the 1880s, a marker over a mass grave honored 10 soldiers and an "unknown civilian guide."

Ron Stover, a television news photographer at KAKE-TV in Wichita, discovered Red Bead's identity while conducting research earlier this year for a movie screenplay.

About 60 people, including a descendant of the Apache leader Geronimo, attended the ceremony, which featured a 21-gun salute and an Indian war dance.

"We are out here today to pay tribute and show our appreciation to an Indian scout who served his country well," said Col. John Fincher, Fort Leavenworth garrison commander.

Red Bead and the soldiers died on July 1, 1867, about 40 miles northeast of Goodland in what was known as Kidder's Massacre. They were attacked by between 100 and 200 Sioux and Cheyenne warriors as they searched for Gen. George Armstrong Custer and the 7th Cavalry.

The Army had hired Red Bead as a guide for a troop of 10 men led by Lt. Lyman S. Kidder at Fort Sedgewick, in the northeast corner of Colorado.

Fireworks on sale, as holiday returns

By ALISON NEELY
Collegian Reporter

To all who enjoy adding a bang to the Fourth of July, buy fireworks now. Sales in Manhattan begin Thursday and last through midnight on the Fourth.

A permit is required to sell fireworks. The city of Manhattan issues them for $25, and nine permits have been purchased, said Roger Stewart, Manhattan fire inspector.

The permits allow the sale of Class C fireworks, which includes firecrackers, pinwheels and snakes. Sale of more dangerous fireworks, such as cherry bombs, M-80s and bottle rockets, is illegal.

The legal Class C fireworks are being sold at nine sites throughout Manhattan. Luckey Junior High School Booster Club is selling them at the Wal-Mart parking lot, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd. The club sells on consignment from the O.K. Fireworks Corp. of Oklahoma.

The Boosters, with the assistance of the members' children, have run the stand for several years.

"You have to have a grade school kid in the stands at all times. They all know what everything does. We (adults) really get a bang out of it, too," said Patty Wadick, a Booster Club member.

The No. 1 most popular firework is the conventional firecracker, Wadick said. A purchase of 300 firecrackers will cost $2, while the other fireworks sell two for the price of one.

The Class C weapons are legal to shoot off in the city, but shooting off bottle rockets and other dangerous materials could result in legal action.

"(Bottle rockets) almost act like a small gun...It's a good way to put out an eye," said Sgt. Robert Sabar of the Riley County Police Department.

Between 1900 and 1930 more than 4,000 people died from accidents involving fireworks. Some deaths occurred at manufacturing plants, and others died from using them incorrectly or while watching.

In 1937, the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness appealed to the manufacturers for improvements in construction and content. They complied but there was still no official regulation for fireworks.

Since 1976, the United States Consumer Product Safety Commission and the American Pyrotechnics Association have worked together for regulation. To qualify as Class C, firecrackers must contain 50 milligrams of gunpowder. Airborne fireworks such as bottle rockets have 130 milligrams each.

Pyrotechnics is the art of manufacturing and discharging fireworks. Over the centuries, credit for this art has been attributed to the Chinese, Arabs, Germans and English.

Almost 2,000 years ago, the Chinese were manufacturing primitive fireworks. They packed finely ground charcoal and sulfur into bamboo tubes and attached a fuse, said Martha Brenner, author of "Fireworks Tonight!" They began using gunpowder in the sixth century.

Fireworks flourished during the Italian Renaissance of the 15th and 16th centuries. They created lavish ground productions, including a wood set carved and painted to look like a castle or temple. The fireworks tied to the frame were often discharged in a theater for entertainment of the elite crowd, Brenner said.

Metal salts were added to production methods during the 19th century, creating vivid reds, greens, yellows and blues. Saltpeter, or potassium nitrate, created a louder bang.

The construction of fireworks allows for the maximum explosion possible. The wick runs down the side of the cardboard tube to the gunpowder at the bottom. When the powder burns it releases chemical energy. This energy breaks the bonds holding together the powder elements of charcoal, sulfur and saltpeter. The atoms then recombine, producing heat and gas which cannot escape due to the cardboard tube. The gas expands rapidly, ultimately creating pressure and an explosion, which is the bang.

If too much gunpowder is put in the firework, a serious injury could occur.

Agriculture college stresses economics

By CANDISE L. LEONARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This is the fifth in a nine-part series dealing with the five-year plan for the University's colleges.

Strengthening the College of Agriculture's programs in instruction, research and extension is important in achieving the college's mission — to utilize them for economic development, said Walter Woods, dean of the college.

"It is important to strengthen these programs right here where the ag industry is centered," Woods said.

The strategic planning report stated the college should continue to use its resources to provide a center for Kansas agriculture. In addition to the college, Woods said he knew the report must include the Agricultural Experiment Station and the Cooperative Extension Service.

"Part of the strength we have is because of the diversity of expertise in each of these agricultural entities," Woods said. "They all tie together closely."

Woods said he is optimistic about the long-range planning results. The areas of food processing and other methods of adding value to Kansas products were identified as goals of the Legislature in several studies regarding economic development. These areas can be addressed by the agricultural entities at K-State, he said.

"Two examples would be research expanding the methods of food processing and the marketing of crops," Woods said. "Our programs and long-range proposals are right on target."

In the five-year plan for the instructional arm of the college, it was proposed to drop one degree — the master's degree in crop protection. Everything else was deemed important for the college's future goals.

"That is not to suggest that change is not occurring," Woods said. "A number of departments made curriculum modifications and streamlined their programs."

The report targeted agricultural profitability, human health and wellness, utilizing human resources and rural revitalization as four extension areas on which to concentrate during the next five years.

"Through the extension information system, we need to respond to those emerging issues, especially food processing and economic development," Woods said.

The approach to the processing of food products can be interdisciplinary, he said. Research has already begun with meats, dairy products, grain products and grain by-products.

"We are building on a strong base of knowledge, and we expect to expand it," Woods said. "Agriculture has been about economic development."

Most research is conducted through the experiment station. K-State has 11 experimental fields and operates four branch stations at Colby, Hays, Parsons and Garden City. Twenty-eight departments are doing research in five colleges at K-State through the experiment stations.

"We have research in agriculture, engineering, human ecology and veterinary medicine," Woods said. "And a significant amount of research is being done in biochemistry with the College of Arts and Sciences."

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

Biotechnology of plants and animals is one of the emerging topics for research on which the long-range planning report focuses. Other topics for Kansas are water quality, food science and human nutrition, range management and dryland agricultural cropping systems.

"Through the diversification of Kansas agricultural technology, we recognize that new crops and new methods of production might offer opportunities for Kansas," Woods said.

To keep that technology moving, the report advocates maintaining the network between state, area and county cooperative extension offices.

"With agents in the counties and specialists at K-State, we have a communications link to all the counties in Kansas," Woods said.

Woods said he would like to see an increase in the amount of in-service training sessions held for the county agents, especially on the subject of economic development.

Extension services can meet the needs for training sessions in two ways, he said. The first is by providing extension specialists to work with the marketing and processing of agricultural products, while the second is through the Development Information: Referral, Coordination and Training program. DIRECT is a service to assist with the establishment of new businesses.

Operating in a similar function is the Farmers Assistance, Counseling and Training Service. FACTS, jointly operated by the State Board of Agriculture and the Division of Cooperative Extension, is designed to handle problems of the farmer in the depressed agricultural situation.

Kansans toast drinking law

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Champagne glasses were held aloft across Kansas Wednesday as restaurant owners and their patrons toasted a new era of public drinking which they said will attract conventions, tourists and better eating establishments to the state.

Kansas voters amended the Kansas Constitution in November to allow public drinking in restaurants in 36 of the state's 105 counties. The Legislature implemented the constitutional change by passing a law during the 1987 session which took effect Wednesday.

The bottom line: private club membership cards are no longer necessary to obtain wine or cocktails at 313 restaurants in 36 counties now licensed as public drinking establishments.

The areas affected includes all three major metropolitan areas of the state — Wichita, Kansas City and Topeka — and an assortment of smaller cities such as Lawrence, Manhattan, Salina, Hutchinson, Emporia, Pittsburg, Hays, Garden City, Dodge City, Atchison and Leavenworth.

Michele Foley-Harpool, co-owner of Le Beaujolais, a French restaurant in east Wichita, noticed a difference in her customers Wednesday — the first day of legalized public drinking anywhere in Kansas in 106 years.

"People are drinking today," she said. "They're sort of celebrating. It's like they're finally out of jail or something."

Bob Fraser, general manager of Carlos O'Kelly's Mexican Cafe in Topeka, applauded the change in the Kansas Constitution to permit liquor to be served by the drink in public restaurants.

"The main benefit will be in tourism and in attracting conventions to Topeka and other parts of the state," Fraser said. "We may have a card-burning ceremony sometime next week to celebrate."

Miniature bon-fires are planned in many restaurants to roast the plastic private club cards.

The cards were mandatory for any Kansan who wanted to buy a drink with dinner or simply walk into a club for a cocktail.

The Legislature authorized drinking in private clubs in 1965 and a network of private clubs soon sprouted that circumvented the constitutional ban on public drinking. Several hundred clubs statewide linked up via reciprocal agreements that allowed cardholders to drink in just about any Kansas city.

A customer Wednesday in the Longbranch Saloon in Overland Park attested to the loophole created by the private club system.

John Lorimer II, 42, of Overland Park, is a traveling salesman who sells computer training service to large companies in Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Iowa. He said the change will take the hassle out of drinking on the road because he'll no longer need to carry dozens of club cards.

"It was a matter of being resourceful," Lorimer said of drinking under the old system. "If you wanted to drink you could find a way. All they were really forcing you to do was to break the law."

Mike Day, general manager of the Longbranch, reported three customers toasting the first day of liquor by the drink in Kansas. Otherwise, it was a fairly uneventful occasion.

Physicians protest high insurance rates

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Doctors protesting the nation's highest malpractice insurance rates curtailed emergency services Wednesday in South Florida and threatened to quit treating patients to mark what they called "Disaster Day."

The state's largest malpractice insurer boosted its premiums by up to 42.7 percent and the second-largest stopped renewing policies altogether.

Hardest hit by the boycott was Broward County, where the number of emergency rooms accepting trauma patients with head and spinal cord injuries shrank from 16 to four, said Ralph Marrinson, chairman of the county's emergency management resources committee.

A 2-year-old girl with seizures was turned down by three hospitals before being taken to Broward General Medical Center, said emergency rescue worker Pete Pavlicec.

"I'm worried about what it's going to do to the people," Pavlicec said. "We're all potential accident victims."

The president of the Broward County Medical Association balked at calling the physicians' action a strike, saying those withdrawing from emergency treatment had no choice.

"The doctors aren't on strike; they simply can't afford to practice," said Dr. Peter Tomasello. "The leaking dam has cracked."

Obstetricians and neurologists are hardest hit by the malpractice insurance crisis.

Warren Callaway, administrator of HCA Northwest Regional Hospital in the Broward town of Margate, said he knew of an obstetrician who was quoted a rate of $160,000 a year for just $250,000 of insurance coverage.

"That doesn't make much sense, but that's what the insurance company has quoted him," Callaway said. "As a result, he has packed his bags and is moving to Missouri," where he will pay only $6,000.

Broward General, one of the few county hospitals accepting all emergency patients, had a 10 percent increase in its patient load Wednesday morning, and officials said they expected that figure to continue rising.

"This is certainly a harbinger of things to come," said Dr. Thom Mayer, director of emergency medicine for North Broward County. "It's our job to take care of the patients, but there is always an end point when they cannot handle any more."

Half-page advertisements announcing "Disaster Day" were taken out in Miami-area newspapers Wednesday by the Dade County Medical Association, which called the insurance situation "malpractice blackmail."

The ad said many doctors "will have no choice but to quit practicing."

The head of the Dade association said tourists should avoid South Florida.

"If something happens, they (tourists) may not be able to get treated," Dr. Richard Glatzer said.

The protest began building earlier this year when many Dade County emergency rooms temporarily shut down because of the malpractice insurance rates.

Could you use money from Home next semester?

Whether you're starting out for college or finishing up a graduate degree, there's one tough subject you'll have to face next semester.

Tuition.

The good news is, Home State Bank can help you find the money for college. Because just last year, more than 1,000 students received their low interest loans from us.

So, if you have an intense desire for that college diploma, come to Home State Bank. We have just the loan program for you.

Under the Guaranteed Student Loan program, for example, you don't need collateral, a cosigner, or an established credit rating. First and second-year students can receive up to $2,625 a year. For third and fourth-year students, up to $4,000 a year. You make no payments until six months after graduation or after you become a part-time student.

If you're studying in the health professions, there's a special HEAL loan program. And this year, our HEAL interest rate is the lowest in the Kansas City area. In addition, some students receive Supplemental Loans for Students (SLS), and parents of undergraduates can receive loans for college costs through the Parent Loans program.

To receive your student loan application, call Connie Holmes at 321-3333. Your application will be processed and mailed to the school of your choice within 10 days.

Now, isn't that a good reason to call Home?

Vacant lot—signal of a new beginning

By now I'm certain most everyone has noticed the commotion that's going on at the corner of 14th Street and Anderson Avenue. Recently, there were houses sitting proudly, if not a little wearily, on a tree-shaded lot. Now there is dirt, mounds of it, and nothing more. Oh well, such is the consequence of progress.

This lot of dirt is a sign — a glorious signal that a new beginning is near. But a new beginning for what?

I've asked around about the replacement for those proud, weary houses; however, all I receive in reply to my query is a shrug or a puzzled "Huh?"

But, alas, I'm not overly concerned about this ignorance. At least not now. The beginning will come, with or without my knowledge. In the meantime, I can spend a few minutes pondering the possibilities of what awaits that vacant lot.

Quietly, I sit mulling over the problem again and again. Will the building be tall? Narrow? Round? Will it be a building at all? Slowly the answers come to me. I consider each alternative and dispense with those that are either unfeasible or too difficult to spell. The list is whittled down to 10 and my quest is at an end.

Herein, then, are the 10 most needed, most useful structures to occupy the newly vacant lot:

1) A parking lot. True, this is not a structure in the everyday sense of the word. But a parking lot does have to be built from the ground up and whatever it lacks in height, it makes up for in service. A shiny, hot, black surface striped with yellow is perhaps the most useful solution on this list.

2) A small mall. How about an identical miniature of the downtown mall? This mall would be equal in every way to its larger counterpart, but would serve only those under 5 feet in height. All prices, likewise, would be continually discounted by 50 percent.

3) A high-class/quality restaurant. Please let there be fine food in Manhattan. The people of Riley County have undoubtedly stuffed more heat-lamp-preserved meals down their throats than is constitutionally allowed. It's high time they learn the difference between sole almondine and filet-o-fish with fries.

4) An earthquake-detection center. As the landscape of the Midwest begins to realign and move on its own, it is imperative that citizens be protected and warned. The early-warning system would come complete with its own transmission tower so that it can broadcast a large, obtrusive signal to all area television stations should the area suddenly fall under a severe earthquake watch or warning.

5) A movie theater. Wouldn't it be nice if a small, intimate theater was built that only showed classics from the '40s? Fred Astaire and Spencer Tracy film festivals, Bogart and Bacall, Grace Kelly and Ray Milland. Joy and Happiness.

6) The "I Can't Believe It's Yogurt" Pavilion. Any eatery with a name as clever and unique as this one should have its own free-standing building. The business should say goodbye to Nautilus Towers and build a pavilion named in its honor. There could be polo grounds on the roof. Perhaps the inside walls could be made of sugar cones.

7) The KSU Sports Hall of Fame. A small building, I know, but worthy nonetheless. Six simple rooms each representing a different sport: football, basketball, baseball, volleyball, track and other miscellaneous awards. Admission would be $5 with all proceeds going to establish an ice hockey program.

8) An elegant shopping plaza. I can see it now. The rich and influential will come from miles around to shop in this simple, but tasteful, complex. They will carry bags filled with merchandise from Saks Fifth Avenue, Frederick's of Hollywood, Gucci's and White Castle Hamburgers.

9) A new boarding house. Have you ever noticed how many blonde, curly-haired, skirt-clad girls there are strolling along the streets of Aggieville?

It saddens me to observe them on the streets, staggering from a few too many and all the while trying desperately to maintain their dainty, feminine walk despite the constraints of their skirt and heels. It would be a blessing indeed for these girls to have a home as nearby as the vacant lot. And if this new boarding house wished to establish greek affiliation then I suggest it be called Beta Kappa Sigma (Blonde Kurly Skirts).

10) Seventeen wishing fountains. In an attempt to equal Kansas City in the number of fountains per capita, a public square with a maze of fountains and shrubberies should be installed on the lot. The wishing fountains would be swept for loose change each week, the proceeds going to buy the latest issue of Spiderman comics for Farrell Library.

Well, there you have it. Ten more or less plausible ideas for the vacant lot at 14th and Anderson. Unfortunately, three containers looking suspiciously like huge, red Tylenols have been recently placed among the piles of dirt. What does this mean? It has been suggested that these giant caplets are gasoline storage tanks. Does that mean the people of Manhattan and K-State are doomed to be deluged by yet another gas station and convenience store?

Or, as I see it, are those cylinders simply deep fat fryers for White Castle french fries? Perhaps they are the shell of an underground seismograph station or pumping units for three monstrous fountains.

The mind reels.

Letters

Editor's note: In response to the letter from Kelli Anderson, Jeanne Webb, Rich Llewellyn, Chris Mikesell and Ron Fleming which appeared in the June 29 Collegian, it should be noted that the Garfield and Peanuts comic strips will reappear in the fall issues of the Collegian. They were discontinued for the summer out of financial necessity. The Collegian has never published the Far Side comics and at this date has no plans to include it.

Jones was off base

Editor,

Re: Bryan Jones' column "Sandinista government is communist" in the June 30 Collegian.

OK. Jones got his chance to rebut an article containing a point of view on the Nicaraguan situation he disagrees with. But his portrayal of the situation was slanted and tainted with inaccuracies.

I'll agree, Sandinista leaders like Daniel Ortega and Tomas Borge are believers in Marxist ideas. Consider why. The capitalist, imperialist power of the United States has meant nothing to Nicaragua but suffering by way of its installation and support of the corrupt Somoza family dynasty that plundered the country for all it could for 50 years before the Sandinistas ousted them from power.

Other leaders of Third World countries have been attracted to Marxist theory, which supports the rights of a poor majority against their exploitation by a rich elite.

Why didn't the Sandinistas trust the United States to back them after the revolution? Just imagine what would have happened when Reagan became president: the same thing that happened anyway — a cutoff of aid, and covert attempts to oust the Sandinistas. They knew that the shaky hand the Carter administration held out to them could be pulled back in an instant.

Now that the Nicaraguan government has been receiving aid from the Soviet bloc (as well as from Western Europe, which Jones failed to mention), isn't it obvious why the desperately economically weak country doesn't bad-mouth the Soviets? Personally, I bad-mouth the Soviets. But they aren't feeding me, clothing me, sending me to school, or providing me with protection from aggression.

Jones is way off base concerning the Miskito Indians. The Sandinistas' grave errors several years back, being too forceful when relocating these people due to Contra infiltration, is very near to being resolved.

Most have been allowed to return to their homelands and set up autonomous local governments. Many have been kidnapped by the Contras.

For an idea of Sandinista behavior as compared to Contra behavior toward Nicaraguan peasants, see Newsweek magazine's issue of a couple weeks past. Guess which party slaughters and eats these peasants' animals, steals the rest of their meagre food supplies, then forces them to scout the mountainsides walking point so that if any land mines or booby traps go off merely peasants and not "freedom fighters" will be lost.

From Jones' description of liberation theology, I would guess him to be a right-wing religious zealot, steeped in the idea that "God's plan" and "the American Dream" are one in the same, unable to tolerate the idea that religious leaders in impoverished Latin American countries are getting fed up with the traditional lies that the poor should be weak and submissive to the rich and powerful, that their reward is in heaven and not on earth.

Racism a disgrace

Editor,

Regarding Scott Miller's column of June 25: "Hidden prejudices necessitate concern." Amen, Scott Miller, amen!

Racism is indeed a filthy little attitude that seems to be well received not only here in Kansas but all over this country. Having worked in Aggieville and several other places in Manhattan that cater to the public, I have come in contact often with pervasive racist comments and jokes alike. They slither into conversations unsuspecting and leave a stench that is hard to miss.

Disgustingly enough, most who utter such dehumanizing trash are seldom aware of the impact of their "jokes." When confronted with the idiocy of their comments most people reply that they either didn't really mean anything by it or that they have a lot of "friends" of the race they are undermining.

Another often used excuse is that old, but whites-can-be-niggers-too garbage.

Racism in all of its despicable forms places us all in neat little boxes. It vastly limits our cultural exchange, puts a damper on the educational value of our schooling, makes murderous our foreign and domestic policy, and most certainly does little for our reputation as Americans abroad.

Racist comments and attitudes alike must be confronted head-on with vehemence and honesty. The more silent and tolerant we remain, the more the festering sore will be allowed to pus over and spread unchecked.

It is a singular disgrace that the people of color in this country are made to feel tainted somehow. Perhaps if the lily-white of our skin was not so blinding, we might realize that a little extra dose of color might do us all some good.

Dole bill akin to McCarthyism

Last week, I attempted to point out some of the prejudices many in this society hold towards Arabs. So pervasive is anti-Arab racism, I argued, that it even resides in the ranks of our "respected" public opinion shapers.

What I'd like to do this week is give an example of how that racism translates into blatant political discrimination. But rather than make an example of someone from the ranks of the media, I thought I might spotlight another influential and "respected" public opinion shaper — Kansas Senator, Senate Minority Leader and presidential hopeful Robert Dole.

Last month, Dole introduced a bill which would close the Palestine Information Office and the Palestine Liberation Organization Observer Mission to the United Nations, as well as make it unlawful to conduct financial transactions with the PLO or any of its constituent groups. If all this sounds completely acceptable in a country calling itself a democracy and ostensibly supporting freedoms of speech and association, it shouldn't.

The PLO is recognized by the United Nations and more than 110 countries as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. It has offices in every Western European capital except Amsterdam, plus 95 offices and embassies throughout the world. Several NATO allies (including Italy, Greece, Spain, Turkey and France) have cultural agreements with the PLO, and the PLO receives diplomatic recognition from more countries than does the government of Israel.

Dole claims the bill is designed to "strengthen the defenses of this country against the real physical threat the PLO represents. Terrorism is the issue," Dole says. "We are not challenging the First Amendment at all. It is simply not an issue."

Dole does not explain why we need another anti-terrorism law, one that singles out a specific group of people and its representative organization, when laws against murder, bombing and kidnapping already exist. Dole does not explain why his bill goes even further to limit the rights of aliens than does the ominous McCarran-Walter Act of 1952, which was passed during the McCarthy witchhunts.

Dole seems unbothered by the fact that the State and Justice Departments do not classify the PLO as a terrorist organization, and equally unbothered by the PLO's agreement to the establishment of a democratic and secular state in the West Bank and Gaza, thus rejecting the idea of a nation, like Israel, built on racial and religious inequality.

Dole seems unaware that the PLO and its constituent groups in this country comply with the Foreign Agents Registration Act and, thus, are entitled to the same First Amendment rights as Dole's own political action committee. After ignoring all this, Dole apparently feels justified in defining what the issues are. As a matter of fact, the issue is not terrorism; it is political grandstanding in the form of Palestinian bashing, and assaulting the First Amendment in the process.

But Dole is not as ignorant as he would have us believe. Certainly a person in his position has attended and presumably passed an elementary course in American civics — certainly Dole knows this bill is unconstitutional and unnecessary. Perhaps Dole has turned to Palestinian bashing because he is a racist. More likely, however, is that he hopes to obtain support from the American-Israeli Political Action Committee, an influential Israeli lobbying group which has long advocated the closing of PLO offices.

That Dole would support a bill so unconstitutional and racially biased is no surprise. Dole is, after all, the same senator who in 1974 supported a genocidal and racist law authorizing the forced removal of 10,000 Native Americans from Big Mountain, Ariz. Dole is the same dedicated public servant who last fall (even after Eugene Hasenfus' cargo plane crashed) rejected the idea of congressional investigations of Reagan's Central America policy because he thought it might embarrass the president.

It was Dole who last fall opposed a Congressional override after Reagan vetoed a decision to impose sanctions against one of Israel's perennial partners in apartheid — the racist regime of South Africa. Now Dole seems to be pandering to the functionaries of Israel itself with apparently no concern for justice, human life, or even the Constitution he has sworn to uphold.

One could make the argument (and this is one I've heard frequently) that Dole's disagreeable position on these and other issues is part of the game of politics, that it is a way of achieving the most viable political alternatives. By lending support to these odious causes, the argument goes, he has earned support for important "Kansas issues," such as farm subsidies and super-colleiders.

While this may be so, one assumption underlying that argument seems to be that imperialist and racist policies are OK so long as the folks back home have something to show for it. My own opinion is that government-backed racism is not a "game," nor is it a viable political alternative. It is neither desirable, nor in the long run possible except in oppressive police states where guerrilla movements such as the African National Congress or the Fatah faction of the PLO will use armed resistance against it.

As I said, Dole's bill is no surprise — it is what I have come to expect from our man in Washington. What is surprising, even appalling, is that many Americans continue shamelessly to take Dole's presidential aspirations seriously.

Professor helps organizations investigate fossilized remains

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

From the bones of buffalo to those of Jesse James, Michael Finnegan, professor of anthropology, has unearthed and identified fossilized remains for historical preservationists, anthropology classes, the FBI and many more groups.

His most recently solved case involved a skull and femur, or thighbone, found by a fossil hunter earlier this month in the Republic River channel near Junction City. The bone specimens the Geary County Sheriff's Department left with him two weeks ago will remain at K-State for future forensic comparisons, Finnegan said.

He said the skull belonged to an Indian who died at least 1,000 years ago at an age between 50 and 70, and the femur belonged to a 5-foot-6 man who died in his early 40s about 100 years ago.

'Any monotony is not the fault of the job.'

— Michael Finnegan

This is one of 65 forensic cases the Geary County Sheriff's Department has left with him to examine in his five years at K-State. Finnegan, one of 30 certified by the American Board of Forensic Anthropology, said he averages 14 cases a year.

"Forty percent to 50 percent of all my forensic cases have involved foul play," he said. "By this I'm referring to both suicides and homicides." Other cases involve archaeological remains.

The pieces in this case will be added to the collection within the Department of Anthropology, Sociology and Social Work for comparisons to other bones found in the area, such as the collection he is expecting from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Though the process is difficult and long, Finnegan reports no signs of boredom or lack of variety.

"Any monotony is not the fault of the job," he said.

Finnegan said his goal with each case is to determine the race, sex, stature and age at time of death. The more pieces of a skeleton he has to examine, the more reliable his results.

To determine the ethnic group to which a bone belongs, he compares it to the characteristics of other groups. The three main biological divisions are mongoloids, negroids and caucasoids.

"The social race classifications don't necessarily go together with the biological classifications," he said.

The mongoloids are characterized by yellowish-brown to white pigmentation, deep epicanthic folds and prominent cheekbones. Examples would include American Indians or Japanese peoples.

The negroid division consists of people with brown to black pigmentation. Africans and black Americans would be included in this category. Finnegan said 30 percent of black Americans' gene pool has white genes, thus making them distinguishable from Africans.

People in the caucasoid division are characterized by skin color ranging from very light to brown and include Europeans.

Finnegan said many cases include group overlap or hybrids. In other cases, such as his recent femur case, race is hard to determine because not enough of the skeleton is available. But with the skull, he looked at circumference measurements, general face shape, nasal passages and cheekbone comparisons.

To determine gender, he examines secondary sexual characteristics such as those found on bones.

Finnegan said he looked on the skull for a bone ridge on the forehead and muscular bumps behind the ears. Both are male characteristics. "Everything about it looked male," he said.

The femur was more complicated because the pelvis was not found. The pelvis structure is one major indicator of gender, a larger pelvis being characteristic of females.

To determine the gender of the male femur, Finnegan said he studied the obtuse angle of the joint and measurements of the leg bone. A woman's pelvis affects the angle and size of the femur.

'Forty percent to 50 percent of all my forensic cases have involved foul play.'

— Michael Finnegan

A skeleton's height is found by applying bone measurements to a chart that takes into consideration the age at the time of death. Age is important because an individual's height decreases over time. Finnegan said he was able to determine the stature of the body to which the femur belonged, but not that of the skull's body since other bone pieces were not found.

Finnegan said he determined the age of the bone specimens by looking at the skull's dentition, or arrangement of teeth, and suture closure markings, the line where the skull's two main bones fuse. With the leg, he cut a cross-section of bone out and examined the carbon content under a microscope.

There are more than 30 other ways to determine the age at the time of death, he said, but they all depend on different parts of the skeleton.

For example, on an entire skeleton the most reliable source of age is determined by pubic symphysis, which entails the study of where the pelvic bones join near the navel.

In 1973, Finnegan worked on his postdoctoral fellowship at the Smithsonian Institution. He has also worked in Brazil, Israel and Jordan.

'Singles' join support group for social relief

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

In 1982, former K-State President Duane Acker faced a troublesome problem. Single faculty members were coming to K-State but not staying because of the lack of singles activities in Manhattan.

Thus, the Konza Connection was born, said Elaine Arganbright, of Manhattan and the organization's current president.

"President Acker got together with a group of faculty members and planned a big open house at his home," she said. "Over 100 singles attended, which shows how much it was needed."

The purpose of Konza Connection is to provide activities in which singles can make new friends and enjoy Manhattan, Arganbright said. It is not a dating service.

"However, I can think of at least six couples who met within the group and got married within the last year," she said.

Currently, the group has 95 to 100 members, Arganbright said. Although faculty started the organization, it is not affiliated with the University.

The group's logo depicts a river running into a sunlit valley, she said. The river means diversity in membership: business people, faculty, greek housemothers, military officers — almost every type of career.

Participants come from as far away as Clifton and many towns in between, Arganbright said.

No age restrictions exist, but the majority of the members range from 35 to 65. Younger singles will sometimes attend, and if they like the group, they stay, she said.

"Most of our people are professionals, fairly well-settled into careers," Arganbright said. "But that doesn't mean we don't have ice fights, drink lots of pop and play volleyball."

Members make new friends

Some participants are widowed or have never married, she said. But the majority have gone through divorces.

In total membership, the number of men and women is fairly equal, Arganbright said, though women seem more willing to attend functions.

"Part of the reason is pride," she said. "Men find it harder to admit that they need a support group. They believe they can handle their social lives all by themselves."

Tom Link, Manhattan resident and last year's president, said this type of group offers more than support. Some people who married young have never gone out.

"I remember one woman who had never even danced," he said.

Functions give singles the opportunity to practice social skills in a "couples world" into which they do not quite fit, Link said.

Some find mingling difficult at first, so they sit in the same chair all night, he said. As they attend more activities, faces become familiar, and they feel more comfortable moving around the room.

"We had one lady whose psychiatrist flat told her to quit feeling sorry for herself and get back in the real world," Link said. "Sometimes it takes six to eight years to get tired of sitting at home after a divorce."

Link said one common misconception about singles groups is that members are a bunch of "losers." When people attend a function and see the doctors, lawyers, teachers and other professionals, their attitudes change quickly, he said.

The Konza Connection is a little different from church singles groups and Parents Without Partners, Link said. Sometimes the church groups are small and revolve around Bible study.

"I was in a church group once, and the same 15 to 20 people planned and attended all the activities," he said. "They certainly aren't all that way, but to really succeed, a group has to have enough members to share the social burden."

"I like the idea that new people are constantly coming into a group this size."

PWP generally includes children in their activities, Arganbright said. But most of the people in Konza Connection are at the age when their children are grown, she said. The younger parents enjoy a night away from their children every once in awhile.

The group meets for refreshments and conversation at 6:30 p.m. each Friday in The Greenery, a club inside the All Seasons Motel on Tuttle Creek Boulevard, Arganbright said. One Friday each month they have a dance night in either Manhattan or a neighboring town.

Although the group occasionally goes to singles seminars, conversation generally does not center on divorce or other problems, she said. Many of the members are beyond that when they join the group.

"The officers must be organized and outgoing because it's important that they be seen at functions," Arganbright said. "Sometimes, a new member is looking for any excuse to leave, so we provide a familiar face who can hopefully introduce him to someone with similar interests."

The group is working on a letter to be included in the new faculty packet at K-State, too, she said.

Teacher sees life through telescope

Planet-lover finds gazing career 'romantic'

By JACQUELINE JORDAN
Collegian Reporter

It happened in seventh grade.

David Lien, assistant professor of physics, fell in love with the heavens and stars. It was then he decided to become an astronomer to better understand nature and explain how this science can best benefit mankind.

"I was in seventh grade when a friend of mine invited me over to his house to look at the stars," Lien said. "I thought it was a pretty boring thing to do, but since I had nothing else to do, I went. By the end of the week, I had checked out several books from the public library."

Astronomy is romantic for Lien because he enjoys his work.

"It is romantic in the sense that I devoted my entire life to it and because I enjoy working at it," he said.

"All you need is your naked eye and a black sky to see what is out there" to appreciate astronomy, Lien said.

"It's phenomenal to see how beautiful the sky really is," he said. "When you look at specific areas (in the sky), it's amazing how objects will jump out at you and look three-dimensional."

"It is also amazing to see objects through a telescope. When you look at Saturn, for example, and realize that here is an object that is nine times (larger) in diameter than the earth, and is sitting 30 times away from you, and you realize that you can see it and study it...the rest is history."

Even though K-State doesn't offer an undergraduate degree in astronomy, Lien said students can check out small telescopes through the Physics Activities Center in 219 Cardwell Hall.

Two years ago, Lien gave a lecture at K-State on Halley's comet before it passed the earth this year.

"Now we will have to wait 76 years before we can see it again," he said.

Although Lien's expertise involves the study of this comet, he isn't unoccupied due to the long time lapse between the comet's visits.

Rather than waiting, Lien has finished collecting data on 20 different comets and is now in the process of comparing information, contrasting one comet with another and simplifying extensive data.

Lien worked at Lowell Observatory in Flagstaff, Ariz., for two years and was scheduled to look at the sky for 120 nights during four consecutive months.

"My research background was in the interest of an interstellar medium, which is gas and dust between stars," he said. "Comets are essentially leftovers from that. When the solar system formed, there were little pieces left over, and what we see today as leftovers are comets."

Lien teaches an astronomy class, General Physics and a beginning physics class, The Physical World I.

"I enjoy teaching because the result of one's research is to disseminate information to new generations," he said.

Today Lien sits in a small rectangular office where stacks of books and papers are piled neatly around him. A square window above the door suggests there is still something different yet to be seen and discovered outside.

In the realm of discovering things, Lien said it is important to study astronomy or any other science in order to broaden one's mind and learn to view the world in different ways.

"Students should take science courses because (there are) variety of people in this world who all perceive things differently because

Ensemble exhibits 'good' jazz

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reviewer

Rich Matteson and the KSU Jazz Ensemble played an hour's worth of solid jazz in the Union courtyard early Wednesday afternoon. About 80 people stayed for the entire show, while many more caught bits of songs as they strolled by.

Music Review

The ensemble was led by saxophonist Bill Harshbarger, assistant instructor of music. Keith Woolery banged on the skins (that means played the drums in jazz lingo. Get hip, Daddy-O.) Tim George played the bass guitar and Don Smith was the pianist. Bill McFarland played trumpet. Also, the ensemble was joined several special guests.

Matteson, who along with Woolery was in town for the K-State jazz camp, played the euphonium, a large, baritone-looking instrument that, when played well — as Matteson did — delivers a deep, smooth sound.

Also joining the ensemble for two songs was K-State graduate Connaire Miller. She came out of the audience and sang a jumpy version of "The Lady is a Tramp" in which she displayed a fine ability to scat. However, before that she sang a soulful "Georgia" which gave me goose pimples. The amazing part was not that she sang the songs well enough to excite my central nervous system. That was expected. It was amazing that she did it without much preparation.

Overall, it was good show. There was nothing too flashy. It was just a Actors join theater

Guest students visit K-State

By ANNJELA HYNES
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Summer Repertory Theatre received a special treat this summer when two guest students joined the theater troupe.

Eric Johnson, senior in theater at McPherson College, and Jill Towsley, senior in theater at the University of Kansas, were selected from about 40 others who auditioned at the April convention of the Association of Kansas Theatre in Salina.

The two artists said they want to make theater their career.

"Theater is something I decided to do when I was 10," Towsley said. "I pursued it seriously after that."

"It's rare for someone to wake up one morning their freshman year and say, 'Oh, I want to do theater,'" said Rhonda Miracle, instructor of speech.

Johnson, on the other hand, is an exception. Although always interested in theater and music, he entered college four years after graduating from high school and spent his first semester in McPherson's unique automobile restoration program.

"I found that it was going to be a fun hobby but not a good occupation, so I changed," he said.

But salary was not a factor in his decision to change to theater, he said.

"I can sell myself," Johnson said. "I'm not worried about getting a job...you have to want to do it pretty bad if you've been in it this long."

Towsley agreed. "For right now, money is not that important."

Miracle said one artist was chosen last year and about three the year before that.

"We made a concerted effort to find out-of-towners this year...we picked the ones we thought would be the best for our needs and interviewed them," she said.

Both artists are paid $800 for the summer.

"We pay our semi-professionals, but they get credit for it, as well," Miracle said.

Rehearsals for the three productions average between six and nine hours a day. The first performance, "Painting Churches" by Tina Howe, opened Wednesday night in Nichols Theatre.

Christopher Durang's "Beyond Therapy," a comedy about a contemporary couple who meet through the personal ads, begins tonight and Moliere's "Tartuffe" opens Friday. The performance schedule will alternate through July 25.

"This experience has given me a chance to do a lot of different things here," Towsley said. "Manhattan has been a nice change. I've gotten to meet a whole new group of people."

Johnson, whose hometown is DeKalb, Ill., said he comes from a small department at McPherson.

"Here I'm getting to work with a lot more directors, a lot of good people," Johnson said.

Johnson, who plans to go into musical theater, has had a previous role in a production of "Godspell" at McPherson and has future plans of going to graduate school for a master's degree.

Towsley was in a production of "Come Back to the Five-and-Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean" and would like to go to a graduate school stressing performance.

Summer repertory theater begins

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

Comic Reflections, the K-State Players month-long summer season, opened Wednesday night with the production of "Painting Churches." Other performance dates are July 8, 11, 17 and 23.

Set in a Victorian Boston home, "Painting Churches" by Tina Howe is about a retired college professor, his wife and their artist daughter.

The play unfolds around the Church family as they prepare to move from their family home. They reflect on their memories as they pack up their past.

Returning to the family home for the last time, the daughter fulfills a lifelong desire to paint a portrait of her parents.

Christopher Durang's comedy "Beyond Therapy" will open tonight at 8. Performance dates include July 9, 15, 18 and 24. The play deals with the fast-paced life of urban society.

"Beyond Therapy" is a look at a young professional couple who meet through a personal ad in a newspaper. The escapades of their relationship address the difficulties of developing a relationship in a crazy society.

Opening Friday night is "Tartuffe," an 18th-century comedy by Moliere. Tartuffe, a religious hypocrite, acquires the friendship and trust of the doddering Orgon and takes advantage of the situation. The comedy comes forth when Orgon's wife and maid scheme to expose Tartuffe for the scoundrel he is.

"Tartuffe" will also be performed July 10, 16, 22 and 25.

Summer Repertory Theater productions begin at 8 p.m. Tickets are $6 for the general public and $4 for students and senior citizens. Tickets are available in Nichols Box Office.

Parrish grants opportunities to aspiring walk-on players

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

A walk-on in any sport faces a big challenge in making the team, but according to some Big Eight football coaches, it's an opportunity open to any student.

"We feel we have a very good walk-on program, and many of our walk-ons play very important roles to our team," said Stan Parrish, K-State's head football coach.

Last spring Parrish's "12th man program" resulted in more than 70 hopefuls trying for a shot to make the squad. Parrish said he started this push in hopes of garnering non-recruited athletes with good abilities to play on special teams.

Tom Dillon, sophomore in secondary education, was one of those chosen to stay with the squad and will make important contributions to special teams this fall, as well as the other walk-on players this fall, he said.

Parrish, like other coaches throughout the Big Eight, said students who feel they have the ability to play in this conference should walk on.

Many of the teams in the Big Eight support an equal opportunity standard and rely heavily on their walk-on programs.

"The number of walk-ons we keep when school starts depends a lot on the number we have asked back from the previous spring," said Jim Coahran, recruiting coordinator at the University of Kansas. They support men trying to walk-on but have to make large cuts each fall because there isn't enough space to handle the number trying out, he said.

The University of Missouri advocates its walk-on program to non-recruited players, said Bill McConnel, defensive secondary coach at MU.

"We hope to get around 35 to 40 walk-ons each fall, and we usually see enough bright spots in some of them to keep several," McConnel said.

The University of Nebraska's walk-on program is a little tighter to break into, though. Because of the reputation attached to Nebraska football, each year more and more players were trying out for the team and it just got to be too many players to handle, said Dave Gillespie, NU recruiting coordinator.

"We were getting more than 100 walk-ons each fall, which was just too many guys to look at fairly," Gillespie said.

Two years ago, Nebraska incorporated an invitation-only policy mandating that potential players must be invited first, he said. The university mails the potential players letters, informing them Nebraska is interested in recruiting them but can't offer scholarships. If interested, they must send some of their previous game films to Nebraska to be evaluated.

"We feel that after evaluating players in game situations we will know more about what the player can do, as well as save us a lot of time when players report to begin practice," Gillespie said.

Royals executive composes poem, presents copy to Howser's spouse

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Dick Howser lay in a hospital bed near death and John Schuerholz, threading his way through morning traffic, wished he knew why.

The field manager of the Kansas City Royals and the general manager became close friends over what had been just about the most tumultuous six years of their lives. They agonized together and charted a comeback when a drug scandal rocked the team in 1983.

Just two years later, Howser and his boss rolled through downtown Kansas City together in a laughter-filled World Series parade.

Fate allotted only nine months to savor their triumph before doctors found a malignant tumor growing in Howser's brain. For almost a year, Schuerholz had watched Howser fight the disease with a courage that won the admiration of not only the city, but the nation.

As he worked his way through rush hour traffic that melancholy morning, Schuerholz began composing a poem. By the time he arrived at work, every verse was etched in his mind, and he quickly transferred the words to paper.

Howser would die a few days later, on June 17. And Schuerholz, his voice cracking, would read that poem — exactly as it had come to him that morning — during memorial services in Kansas City and Tallahassee, Fla.

"The words just came to me, the way they have at other times of emotional intensity in my life," said Schuerholz, who studied poetry and literature and taught school before deciding his destiny lay in baseball.

But what began as a personal expression for Howser's wife, Nancy, is becoming part of the public legacy of the popular Howser. Dozens of people who heard Schuerholz at the memorial services have requested copies of the 17-line tribute.

It was also suggested that Schuerholz read it Friday night when the Royals retire Howser's No. 10 and induct him into their Hall of Fame.

"Dick's passing was imminent. The words just came to me as I was driving to work," Schuerholz said.

"They just came to me."

Poetry might seem an unusual hobby for somebody voted major-league executive of the year in 1985. But Schuerholz always had a love for literature and poetry, and attended the Baltimore Institute of Art during several summers in high school, he said.

Schuerholz does not find moments of poetic creativity so much as they find him.

"My poems seem to flow naturally from something that's in me," he said. "The feeling comes first. And then the words capture the feeling."

Schuerholz first presented Nancy Howser with a copy of his poem and then asked for permission to read it.

"We're going to have it done in a very beautiful and artistic fashion so that it's something she can hang in her home."

It has also been suggested the poem be included in Howser's Hall of Fame display in Royals Stadium.

"I'm not sure what will be there. It will be whatever is deemed the most appropriate," Schuerholz said. "The poem was mostly a personal thing. It was something from my heart that I really wanted to share with Nancy."

The poem reads:

"Connie Mack and Casey Stengel and Walter Alston wait to greet their newest brother outside the pearly gate..."

"They'll pull another chair up to the heavenly hot-stove table because they know their newest brother is among the very able..."

Connie was the first to speak as their new champion passed. "You've brought us not just baseball brains but quite a bit of class..."

Casey stood and gave a wink and pulled him close aside. "You've taught us all something more about this word called pride."

Quietly now Alston rose and shook his hand so tight. "Young man, you showed us all just how to wage a valiant fight."

The three of them then wrapped their arms around their newest member and led him to another one whose embrace is the most tender.

All three spoke in unison and said, "We've struck it rich right now, sir. Here's our newest shining star — the classy one — Dick Howser..."

So from now on I have a thought that ought to help us all. Let's think of Dick and all he meant whenever we hear, "Play ball!"

Deb Richard hits golf balls at Manhattan Country Club's driving range Wednesday morning. The Manhattan native was victorious Sunday at the LPGA Rochester International.

Former Manhattan golfer home following initial LPGA tour win

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

For 24-year-old Deb Richard, winning her first tour victory Sunday in the LPGA Rochester International was a dream come true and a big step toward the future.

"It's just the most awesome feeling," said the Manhattan native of her initial win in the Ladies Professional Golf Association Tour last Sunday.

Richard, who's name is pronounced Rih-SHARD, is in Manhattan this week to visit her parents. Richard's father, Patrick, professor of physics, also expressed his joy.

"We are very happy and glad to have her home for the week," he said.

Richard made her name known early on the Kansas links by capturing first-place honors three years in a row at the Class 6A State High School Tournament while attending Manhattan High School from 1979 to 1981.

No one seems to be happier than Richard, with the win and the chance to be home.

"Everyone has been very supportive and just wonderful," said Richard, whose week away from golf is going to be spent with family and friends before it's time to return to the golf course.

Although Richard's competitiveness and strength has been her guide along the way, competing on the pro circuit hasn't been all roses for the young golfer.

"Things started out slow this year but began to get better, and finally this past weekend I could tell it really felt right," she said.

The victory was Richard's first on the tour this year after finishing second twice in 1986. She was also second in the Rookie-of-the-Year standings. This year, she finished ninth at the Mayflower Classic after a taking the lead in the first round. That was her highest finish this year before the Rochester International.

Until they reached the final round, Richard said she led the field of golfers after the first round, despite rainy conditions. This initial win will not conclude the season for Richard.

"After the end of this week I go to Montreal to continue the tour," she said.

Richard, who left the University of Florida, Gainesville, to pursue her golf career, has a few hours of correspondence courses to complete before graduating.

As for golf as a career, Richard said she is really looking forward to a future on the circuit, and after her recent win, golf is the only thing in her plans.

Mini Ryan, Richard's golf coach at the University of Florida, was also quick to add her excitement for Richard.

"Deb is very talented and I'm sure her future is bright in golf."

But for now, Richard is on a high and happy to be home. As for her future in golf, the name pronounced Rih-SHARD will probably be heard quite a bit.

KC wins on Eisenreich's run

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Pinch-hitter Jim Eisenreich doubled off the center field wall to score Buddy Biancalana from first base with one out in the bottom of the ninth and give the Kansas City Royals a 4-3 victory over the Minnesota Twins Wednesday night.

Biancalana was pinch running for Steve Balboni, who had reached on third baseman Gary Gaetti's throwing error.

Keith Atherton, 4-3, took the loss in relief of Frank Viola, who had struck out 10 batters in seven innings.

Dan Quisenberry, the fourth Royals' pitcher, picked up his third win against no defeats with 1 2/3 innings of scoreless relief.

The Twins had tied the game in the eighth inning on Randy Bush's single past first baseman George Brett.

Mark Davidson, pinch running for Roy Smalley, after Smalley walked with one out, scored the run after Tom Brunansky's single had moved him to second.

Brett hit a three-run homer in the third inning to give the Royals a 3-0 lead. The home run, Brett's sixth, came after Willie Wilson and Kevin Seitzer singled with one out.

Minnesota scored twice in the fifth inning after loading the bases on singles by Sal Butera, Dan Gladden and Greg Gagne with one out. Kirby Puckett followed with a single to drive in Butera and Gladden and knock out Stoddard.

Calf ropers fail to place at nationals

By RHODA REIN
Collegian Reporter

Even though K-State's rodeo team had two members qualify for the College National Finals Rodeo June 16-20 in Bozeman, Mont., only one was able to compete.

Lee Barr, junior in animal science, teamed up with Daryl Radacy of Panhandle State University at the college finals. Some fast cattle and bad luck caught up with this pair and they did not place in team roping at the finals.

Vernon Gardner, senior in agricultural economics and rodeo team captain, had qualified for the all-around competition, but suffered injuries a week before the rodeo finals and was not able to compete. Qualifying cowboys and cowgirls competed on an individual and team basis for scholarships and awards.

The K-State rodeo team competes against 15 to 17 schools in the Central Plains region of the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association.

"Our region is one of the toughest regions in the nation," said Paul Young, NIRA regional faculty director. "Kansas and Oklahoma have a high concentration of tough rodeo competitors."

"Students who finish a two-year college in the Central Plains region and transfer to another region say that our region is very tough," Young said.

Six men and three women make up a college rodeo team. There are five events for men and three for women. Both may enter the team roping event, Young said.

College rodeos consist of one round and a final top 10 competition for each event. The college national finals rodeo has two go-rounds before the final top 10 competition. Possible points are quadruple those of a regional rodeo so whoever wins the finals usually wins the national title as well.

"Everyone's best five scores out of 10 total rodeos are added to decide who goes to the national finals," Young said. The top two individuals in each event and the top two teams in each region compete in the college finals.

This complicated scoring system has its problems.

"If a rodeo coach has strong team members who qualify individually, he may decide to bump them from the three- or six-member team and add a mediocre team member," Young said. "The individual would still compete at the finals, but their points would not help the team total."

"This gives another member the opportunity to compete at nationals. This approach is used by coaches to add depth and experience when they know that winning the national team title is not realistic," Young said.

Another problem is the unequal distribution of talent among the 11 NIRA regions. "It is possible for average competitors to qualify for the college national finals because they rodeo in an easy region," said Doc Gardner, Panhandle State University rodeo coach.

"A pretty good competitor can really score a lot of points in a weak region," Gardner said of regions such as the Grand Canyon, Northwest and the Ozarks that have stars. "But he might not place in a tough region like ours."

The national women's all-around winner, Sherrylynn Rosser of Southern Arkansas University in the Ozark region, did not place in barrel racing, the only finals event she came back in, and still had earned enough regional points during the year to win the year-end all-around title, Gardner said.

The women's all-around winner was Shelley Meter of Chadron State College of the Central Rocky Mountain region. She earned the most points during finals competition.

Carla Shirley, Northwest Oklahoma State University, was the Central Plains region all-around winner and captured fifth place in national all-around standings.

Southwestern Oklahoma State University's women's team placed first in the region and won fifth in the nation.

Two years ago, the Southwestern

Oklahoma State University's men's team won the national men's team title. This year they finished a second to Blue Mountain Community College.

The national men's all-around went to Bradley Goodrich of Blue Mountain. Wayne Smith Jr. of Southwestern Oklahoma State University was fifth in the all-around standings. Smith placed ninth in the saddle bronc riding event, and he and Mark Ladner, also of Southwestern, won the national team roping title.

Payne Dobler, Southwestern Oklahoma State University won the national finals bareback bronc riding competition, but Steve Abernathy, a Western Oklahoma State bronc rider, had more total points and came home with the year-end national title.

Calf ropers Justin Lankford and Gregg Ash, helped their Southwestern team win second. Ash split second and Lankford won fourth at the college finals.

Connors gains win in England

By The Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — Jimmy Connors, the last American left in men's singles, defused the power of Yugoslavia's Slobodan Zivonjovic Wednesday and moved into the semifinals at Wimbledon.

One day after a remarkable comeback victory, Connors put on another gritty performance to defeat the big-serving Yugoslav 7-6, 7-5, 6-3.

Connors, appearing in his 11th semifinal at Wimbledon, will face 11th-seeded Pat Cash of Australia who produced a 6-3, 7-5, 6-4 upset over Sweden's Mats Wilander, the No. 3 seed.

College retains accreditation

By The Collegian Staff

The College of Human Ecology has been granted continued accreditation by the American Home Economics Association. President Jon Wefald announced at the Board of Regents meeting Friday in Topeka.

"The college was first accredited by the American Home Economics Association 10 years ago," said Barbara Stowe, dean of the college. "Kansas State offers the only accredited human ecology program in the state."

"When accredited, you follow their format of organization. There is a five-year interim review, and an extensive review is conducted at the end of 10 years."

The extensive review consists of a full self-study done by the college and a week-long on-site visit, she said.

A peer review team, comprised of administrative and faculty members from universities comparable in size and scope to the college, visited K-State in December 1986 to critique the college and report to the AHEA.

Recommendations made by the association to Wefald suggested more attention be given to "strengthening critical thinking, analytical skills and problem-solving in courses offered."

The association cautioned the college to realistically establish clear program priorities in light of available resources and K-State's diminishing resource base.

Also recommended was increased faculty research productivity and increased opportunities for undergraduate students to participate in research.

The college's program was commended for the quality of the program. The outreach program serving the needs of individuals and families was one of the programs worthy of special mention.

Facets of the outreach program include Working With Families conferences, the Family Center and the child development laboratory programs. These serve as exemplary instruction, research and service activities, which are responsive to the interests of contemporary families, the report said.

The peer review team said the work of the K-State faculty on the needs of rural families is nationally recognized.

Panels hear North; Casey set up fund

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Fired White House aide Oliver L. North, ending seven months of silence, was questioned in a "friendly and businesslike" session Wednesday about President Reagan's role in the Iran-Contra affair.

Wearing his olive-green Marine Corps uniform with six rows of decorations, North gave a "thumbs up" signal to a bystander and smiled as he entered a green-carpeted room in the basement of the Rayburn House Office Building for a private interrogation by House and Senate lawyers.

"What do you plan to tell them?" a reporter asked.

"The truth," North replied. "Is there anything you'd like to say to us?"

"Have a nice day," he said with a smile and a wink.

North then took his seat for questioning by Arthur L. Liman, chief counsel for the Senate investigative committee, and John Nields, the top lawyer for the House panel. He left one hour and 40 minutes later, smiling, waving a salute to a cluster of reporters and photographers, but saying nothing.

Robert Havel, a spokesman for the House committee, said North was put under oath midway through the session and went through the prescribed formula of at first refusing to answer questions because of his Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination.

He was then formally granted limited immunity and responded to a series of questions lasting about 25 minutes.

Lance Morgan, spokesman for the Senate committee, described the session as "friendly and businesslike."

An informal interview preceded the witness' sworn responses, Morgan said. He said those questions were limited to North's "knowledge of the extent of the president's involvement in or knowledge of the diversion, if any," of Iran arms sale money to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

Morgan said this will be North's only private question-and-answer session and added, "The next time we expect to see Colonel North is Tuesday, July 7, in the Senate Caucus Room."

The two committees had served notice last week that the initial, private session with North would focus on the extent of Reagan's involvement in the secret effort — once led by North — to assist Nicaraguan rebels using profits from arms sales to Iran.

Considered the prime target of a separate criminal investigation by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh, the Marine lieutenant colonel also sent his lawyers to a federal court hearing to press North's legal challenge of Walsh's authority.

North's private testimony, a prelude to unlimited public questioning scheduled to begin next Tuesday, was compelled by a grant of limited immunity from prosecution by the House and Senate Iran-Contra committees. North can still be prosecuted on evidence obtained independently of his congressional testimony.

The immunity grant ends North's persistent refusal to answer all questions about the Iran-Contra affair by invoking his Fifth Amendment right to avoid self-incrimination.

Meanwhile, intelligence sources said the late CIA Director William Casey awarded one of the spy agency's largest pay bonuses to Alan Fiers, a covert officer who is said to have helped direct the agency's assistance to the Contras while U.S. military aid was banned by Congress.

One source said Fiers' bonus, given under an incentive program for meritorious service, totaled about $20,000, which would amount to a one-time pay increase in the 30 percent range.

In response to a subpoena, North on Tuesday gave the investigating committees seven notebooks filled with documents relating to the arms sale and U.S. aid to the Contras.

He said they included "personal calendars; correspondence; handwritten notes, a code book; photos and miscellaneous items; telephone logs, and copies of 21 spiral notebooks containing day-to-day notations of some of my conversations and activities which may relate to the subject matter of your inquiry."

Group tells governor to keep waste accord

By The Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — A task force recommended to Gov. Kay Orr on Wednesday that Nebraska not withdraw from the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact, although some members gave the five-state compact low marks.

On the eve of Orr's journey to Little Rock, Ark., to meet with the governors of other compact states, the task force debated the legal, financial and safety issues involved in retaining Nebraska's membership in the multi-state pact.

"I think there is general agreement at the moment that the compact offers the best solution" to disposing the waste, task force chairman Norm Thorson of Lincoln said after the meeting.

The two-hour meeting culminated with task force members debating two versions of a resolution on Nebraska's status in the compact. One recommended that Nebraska "not withdraw" from the compact and the other said the state should "remain" in the compact.

With some members castigating the compact's performance, the 23-member group decided to adopt the non-binding resolution that recommended to Orr that Nebraska "not withdraw." The Legislature, and not the governor, has the authority to withdraw Nebraska from the compact, Thorson said.

After the meeting, task force members met with Orr to submit their recommendation and talk about the issue, which has ignited into controversy in some areas of Nebraska and other compact states. Other states in the compact are Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana.

Task force member Ron Ellermeier of Glenvil, the chairman of the Nebraska Sierra Club, said he and his organization were "nearing the edge" of supporting Nebraska's departure from the compact.

"I'm uncomfortable with the compact, but I'm willing to give it a little more life," Ellermeier said.

Sen. Sandra Scofield of Chadron, another task force member, said she currently doesn't favor Nebraska's withdrawal, but added that she wants to keep her options open.

"I think there's room for improvement," she said of the compact's performance.

Members critical of the multi-state pact questioned whether the compact had too much authority over the states. They also questioned whether liability and financial matters had been resolved and whether the regional system of disposing waste is a proper policy.

The task force approved a resolution by Scofield and Sen. Stan Schellpeper of Stanton urging the governors of compact states to ask Congress to re-examine the disposal of radioactive waste.

The resolution said Congress should review, among other things, whether to limit the number of new disposal sites, provide liability coverage and give incentives to reduce the volume of waste.

Federal law requires a disposal site be found by January. The compact's commissioners have selected US Ecology to develop the waste site.

David Hoelting, a Pender physician, said the question of compact membership should boil down to whether a Nebraska-only waste site would be as safe or safer than a regional dump.

University seeking to fill 2 positions

Candidates vie

Search goes on

By The Collegian Staff

Four finalists for the position of assistant vice president for institutional advancement/University Relations at K-State will visit campus during July for open forums.

Candidates are John T. Fairman, Ron Hamm, Fred W. Hensley and John A. Holley, said Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement and chair of the search committee.

To allow people to meet the candidates and ask questions, one-hour forums will begin at 1:30 p.m. in K-State Union 212.

Hamm is scheduled to be on campus on Monday, Bosco said.

Replacing the director of communications position that was vacated last spring, the new assistant vice president will report to Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, Bosco said.

Responsibilities will include University Relations, comprised of news and information, university publications, Printing Service and Photographic Services, market research regarding public relations and coordination of University Relations staff.

By The Collegian Staff

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said the search is continuing for a Bramlage Coliseum Director. Michael R. Barber, who was named to the position, declined the offer and accepted a job nearer his home.

"We are fortunate in that we had many outstanding people apply for this position. The field turned out four good candidates," Miller said.

As soon as the search committee can choose an individual from the remaining three candidates, K-State will have a coliseum director, he said.

There are not many arenas like this in the country, Miller said, so the job announcement drew a large amount of candidates. Initially 61 people applied for the position.

The director will be responsible for the promotion, finances, personnel and maintenance of the coliseum, scheduled to begin operating in October 1988.

Barber will become vice president for facility management with Russ Cline and Associates, a Kansas City, Mo.-based firm, Miller said.

Task force votes to ratify highway

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden's highway task force resolved perhaps its most controversial issue Wednesday, then began the time-consuming task of deciding precisely what projects should be included in a billion dollar-plus road construction program and how to pay for it.

The task force voted to include a four-lane highway for southeast Kansas in the recommendations it will submit to Hayden later this month, although in a slightly scaled down form from what Transportation Secretary Horace Edwards proposed a month ago.

The approved route would include a four-lane expressway from Wichita to Fredonia, utilizing four-lane roadway along the Kansas 96 corridor either already built or under construction, and upgrading K-96 and U.S. 160 to so-called "Super Two" lane standards to the Missouri border via Neodesha and Parsons.

That compromise proposal on the southeast Kansas highway, offered by Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, who is chairman of the Senate Transportation and Utilities Committee, would cut about $200 million from the total cost of the program — lowering it from $1.8 billion to $1.6 billion.

Morris and other legislators on the task force said the total cost must be trimmed some more — probably to around $1.3 billion — to have much chance of gaining approval by the Legislature in a special session which Hayden plans to call late this summer to consider the plan.

Besides deciding the southeast Kansas route, Edwards announced a change in the proposed route of a new northwest Kansas highway. He said he sensed a majority of the task force members preferred taking that road another way to link Wichita and Hutchinson to Interstate 70.

Edwards' change would route the new "northwest passage" on a diagonal from Hutchinson to Great Bend, then northward on the U.S. 281 corridor to join I-70 at Russell.

they all interact with the world differently," he said.

Studying science is like saying, "Let me improve my own understanding of how things work," Lien said. "It is like looking at how mechanisms of a watch work to see how the wheels, springs and gears work together."

"Science is just like that. We have in a sense, a big clock, call it nature, and it keeps doing the same thing over and over again as well as throwing in some surprises."

Although Lien thought astronomy involved taking "pretty pictures and looking at the stars," he said astronomers today should be called astrophysicists because they apply physics to observations of astronomy.

Astronomy is a science that changes as physics changes. With high technology, Lien said the future will see a departure of astrophysics "because with precise observations, we will be able to understand much better the physics behind the objects."

Ancient astronomers learned how to mark the positions of heavenly objects, he said, but they also used this science to keep time, thus making calendars to apply it to their daily living.

Today, though many pilots, navigators and amateur astronomers are able to use a similar system to determine their positions on a map, Lien said the human race still operates on a time-keeping calendar system, though with subtle changes.

Lien said what "modern astronomy" holds for mankind is the use of high-technology instruments such as navigation satellites, which make observations more precise and make possible the determining a position on a highway in an overlay map.

"The satellites surround the earth and send out signals. One can determine where one is by determining the arrival time of two or more signals from two or more satellites and by knowing when these signals were sent out. This is faster and electronically controlled."

"With this high-tech equipment, one can see the subtleties (of objects in the sky) and understand them better," Lien said.

Computers help astronomers double check information to verify theories. Moreover, he said, with new equipment they are able to make better mathematical models.

"We are trying to describe nature, not solve it or describe that it exists, but rather we are trying to explain it. As science progresses we will continue to make mistakes, but we will also realize we know more and our understanding will change."

group of musicians playing basic jazz songs. The play list reads like a jazz classics album from K-Tel. Besides the two songs they did with Miller, the ensemble also played the Duke Ellington classic "Take the A Train" and the jazz standby "Secret Love." They also played a few other songs that are just as famous as the ones listed.

However, the show did get a little redundant. Just about every song featured a section where the horns traded off improvised jazz sequences. But hey, whaddya want for free. All the musicians played well — not outstanding, but well.

The horns made the ensemble, though Woolery's drums kept everything together. Harshbarger's playing was good, as usual, though he seemed to lack feeling. Matteson made his horn produce everything from soft, mellow sounds to blasting freight-train noises. That is not too bad for a one-hour performance. McFarland, who will be going with the K-State Concert Jazz band to Europe, seemed timid, but he played well.

The show was a nice treat — not an exhibition of flashy jazz; just a nice, warm taste of good music. Small, loose, impromptu shows like that are what jazz is all about.

"I think our club will be strengthened by having women members. They will add a new dimension to our group. We are looking forward to the change," Larson said.

The Manhattan Rotary Club is in its 70th year. Larson said the has a significant extra purpose in "bringing gown and town together."

"Within the club, the college faculty work together with the town's businessmen. The club helps to foster a good community relationship," he said.

The Manhattan Rotary Club has 208 members, several of whom are also asked to speak at meetings.

Race desegregation center fights for funding

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

The Midwest Race Desegregation Assistance Center, located in the College of Education at K-State, is fighting for funding from the federal government.

The center's funding ended June 30, the end of fiscal 1987, forcing the center to close and leaving nine employees out of work. But the center may re-open if new funding is approved, said Charles Rankin, former center director.

Each year the U.S. Department of Education receives $24 million for the funding of desegregation assistance programs called for under Title IV of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Rankin said.

The department allocates about $16 million to state education departments, and about $8 million is given to regional desegregation centers like the one at K-State, said Steve Brockhouse, acting chief of the U.S. Education Department Equity Training and Technical Assistance Program.

The allocation process, which includes having each center apply for new grants each year under proposed funding regulations, is completed when the education department finalizes the regulations by publishing them in the Federal Register. Rankin said the problem with this year's funding arose with an unexpected change in the proposed regulations, which were made public in February.

"This year, the regulations proposed decreasing the number of centers across the country from 40 to 10," he said.

A decrease in the number of centers poses two immediate problems, Rankin said. The first is a problem of resources.

"Each center in existence has developed contacts and resources in its own specialty area," he said. "This forces each center to develop expertise in the two other center specialties. It's like telling a dentist, 'You are now responsible for treating all types of illness.'"

Brockhouse said the consolidation of centers should pose no great difficulties since the multipurpose centers have worked in the past.

"It's important to keep this in perspective," Brockhouse said. "In fiscal year 1987, when there were 40 centers, each received an award of about $240,000. With 10 centers, the average award will be $820,000."

Brockhouse said the basic purpose of the desegregation assistance centers will remain the same.

"The DAC program will continue to be funded by the U.S. Congress in the same way, and (the education department) will continue to provide technical assistance training to any school district which asks for help," he said.

In addition to race desegregation centers such as the one at K-State, there are also sex and national origin desegregation centers.

The regulations, which were finalized through publication in the Register July 1, will combine all the existing centers into 10 supercenters, one for each region, which would provide the sex, race and national origin desegregation services for that region.

The centers are in existence to help public school districts promote equal education, said Dave Kingsley, program planner and school consultant. The centers operate in areas with a formal desegregation program.

"We look at the school climate," Kingsley said. "We do a lot of staff training and development to help the schools recognize subtle racism which could exist in their programs. The center doesn't get involved in issues such as busing which are up to the district court."

Rankin said the regulations have always required 40 centers, and any institution desiring one has been free to compete by submitting a grant application.

For example, when the centers were first established in 1973, the Region 7 race desegregation center was at the University of Missouri at Columbia. In 1978, K-State competed for and won the Midwest center.

The second problem with such a large decrease in the number of centers has to do with cooperation.

"It's a real detriment that centers which used to cooperate now are forced to compete in order to be funded," Rankin said.

The centers are now faced with a period of uncertainty. Rankin said the Midwest center did apply for new funding under the new regulations and hopes to become one of the new supercenters. The Midwest center will be non-operational until the final word is in.

Regents raise pay for Wefald, faculty

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

Presidents will receive a greater pay increase than faculty at the Kansas Board of Regents institutions for fiscal 1988. The increases for presidents and chancellors ranged from 5 percent to 9.8 percent increase in base pay. The increase in pay for faculty and staff positions was set at an average of 3 percent, said Tom Schellhardt, assistant vice president for administration and finance.

The fiscal year began July 1, but the salary increases approved by the Board of Regents will not take effect until the middle of fiscal 1988.

The increases for employees at K-State will begin either Dec. 18 or Jan. 1, Schellhardt said.

"It all depends on whether the person is on a 12-month contract or nine-month, academic-year contract," Schellhardt said.

The salary increase of the president is part of the total appropriation given to the University and determined solely by the Board of Regents.

"The presidents received a greater increase than the faculty overall because they are the chief administrators, and we want to keep those positions competitive," said Frank Becker, former chairman of the Board of Regents. "The presidents' salary increase is no greater than the cost of one search process, and we have good presidents that we want to keep."

President Jon Wefald will receive a pay increase of 5.4 percent at mid-year, raising his annual salary from $92,000 to $97,000.

The president of The Wichita State University, Warren Armstrong, received the largest increase, raising his salary from $82,000 to $90,000. The chancellor of the University of Kansas, Gene Budig, was given the smallest pay increase. But his base salary remains the highest of all, moving up to $106,000 this fiscal year.

"The (Board of) Regents make their decision based on the presidents' overall performance and the salaries of the presidents at peer institutions," said Stan Koplick, executive director of the Board of Regents.

"(K-State's and KU's) peers are Oklahoma State, Colorado State and Iowa State in the Big Eight, and Oregon State and North Carolina State outside the Big Eight," Koplick said.

After first submitting a self-evaluation, the top administrator of each Board of Regents institution undergoes an evaluation by the regents during the year. The final salary recommendations are not made until the Board of Regents' April or May meeting, said Mike Johnson, assistant to the president.

A mid-year increase for the faculty and staff was also recommended by the Board of Regents, but the Legislature makes the final decision on the amount.

The Board of Regents initially recommended an 8 percent increase for the positions. In the next step of the process, the governor proposed a 2.5 percent increase. Finally, the conference committee of the Legislature approved a 3 percent mid-year adjustment.

"There were only one or two people who noticed the monetary difference in salaries (between presidents and faculty)," said David Schafer, professor of animal science and industry and former president of K-State Faculty Senate.

"Nobody is really bitter about this because (the president's) 5.4 percent is still less than the 8 percent increase we were recommended to receive," Schafer said.

The 3 percent faculty and staff increase for the current fiscal year, granted to all Board of Regents institutions, amounted to $3.6 million for the entire system. K-State's portion was slightly more than $970,000. Further allocation of the funds becomes the responsibility of each university.

"Normally, the salaries can be decided two or three months before the end of the fiscal year," Johnson said.

Officials dedicate Vietnam memorial

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

A crowd estimated at between 4,000 and 5,000 listened to commemoration speeches Saturday in Junction City for the Kansas Vietnam Memorial.

"I knew in my heart that those who made the ultimate sacrifice in one of our most difficult wars would be remembered some day," said Gov. Mike Hayden, a decorated Vietnam veteran.

"We will strive to reach the goals for which they died, and we come here today to remember those who perished and, perhaps, more than anything else, to rededicate our lives to the proposition that they shall not have died in vain."

Pete Coors, president of the Adolph Coors Co., expressed his emotions concerning the memorial.

"I don't think anybody can stand in front of those granite blocks and read names without getting a little bit choked up and getting a tear in their eye.

"It's a very, very special recognition of, not only those whose names are on it, but all of those who participated and did their duty," Coors said. "It's a very emotional experience, and I'm very proud and honored to be a part of it."

Maj. Gen. Leonard P. Wishart III, commanding general of Fort Riley and the 1st Infantry Division

(Mech), spoke of his tour in Vietnam and the many Kansans he met and worked with there.

"From Vung Tau to the DMZ (demilitarized zone), from California to New York, from Texas to North Dakota — there are no finer soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines than those from Kansas. 'Duty First' and may God bless," Wishart said.

Panel to ask North what Reagan knew

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lt. Col. Oliver North breaks his public silence today, facing congressional questioning that is expected to come in quickly on whether President Reagan knew about the diversion of Iran arms-sale money to Nicaragua's Contra rebels.

North will speak publicly for the first time since the affair broke seven months ago, answering questions from chief House committee counsel John Nields, who also plans to introduce more than 200 documents as evidence during his day-long direct examination.

Rather than questioning North chronologically about the Iran arms sales and the Contra aid network, Nields plans to focus on specific issues, House committee spokesman Robert Havel said Monday.

Near the top of the list is the one matter seen as potentially the most explosive for Reagan: whether he was aware that money from the sale of weapons to Iran was being shunted to Central America to arm the Contras at a time when such aid was barred by Congress.

The session, beginning the eighth week of Iran-Contra hearings, will be carried live on the major television networks.

Campus alcohol laws change

By The Collegian Staff

The Kansas Board of Regents voted June 25 to allow institutions to serve alcohol in non-classroom areas. The policy is an addition to legislation passed by the 1987 Legislature relating to alcohol consumption.

It states alcoholic liquor may be permitted under authorized and controlled conditions at functions sponsored by the campus alumni association or endowment association.

Those two groups were named overseers because of the bill introduced by the University of Kansas. The alumni and endowment associations wanted to be able to serve alcohol at the Spencer Auditorium, said Charles Reagan, assistant to the president at K-State.

Reagan said a committee has been formed to study possible places and times alcohol could be served on campus.

Ted D. Ayres, general counsel to the Board of Regents, said the schools had some input on the policy, but the decision was the Board of Regents'.

Guidelines will be determined by the administration of each of the seven schools under the Board of Regents' control and approved by it.

"Some campuses may not want to get into it. This is not a mandatory thing, but the option is there for those schools that want it," Ayres said.

Reagan said President Jon Wefald is in favor of the policy.

"There are certain areas this would be convenient to our campus," he said. "The president's house and lawn are already exempt from this, which has allowed us to serve beer at barbecues and wine at the Christmas reception."

"We haven't worked anything out yet, but we plan to extend this to other buildings on campus such as McCain (Auditorium) and the (K-State) Union — permitting the Board's consent."

Each school is required to report whether there is an interest in serving alcohol in non-classroom areas along with the specific areas desired for that purpose. At that time, the board will determine if the schools' requests meet with the Board of Regents' requirements.

"I'm not sure at this time how much interest there is, but I expect to be hearing in the near future," Ayres said.

U.S. ships in gulf to defend tankers

MANAMA, Bahrain — U.S. Navy ships are cruising the whole Persian Gulf, including the northern off-limits zone declared by Iraq, as they prepare to protect 11 Kuwaiti tankers flying the American flag, shipping officials report.

The exclusion area extends 70 miles from Kharg Island, Iran's main export oil terminal and a regular target of Iraqi air raids in the war that began in September 1980.

Iran has threatened to attack the American warships and U.S. officials will not say where they are patrolling. A shipping official based in the area, who like the others spoke anonymously, said: "They're everywhere in the gulf."

Lt. Cmdr. Stephen Honda, a Navy spokesman, said only that the warships "operate in the gulf and the Gulf of Oman in international waters." The fleet is called the Middle East Force and now includes nine vessels.

One U.S. vessel seen inside the exclusion zone, where Iraq's air force also has concentrated its attacks on tankers, is the missile frigate Reid, sister ship of the USS Stark.

An Iraqi warplane hit the Stark with missiles May 17 about 40 miles south of the exclusion zone, killing 37 American sailors.

Iraq apologized, saying the Iraqi pilot mistook the Stark for an Iranian warship.

Paper claims GM altered odometers

DETROIT — U.S. Attorney Roy Hayes said Monday he will look into newspaper reports that General Motors Corp. employees rolled back odometers on vehicles tested at a plant in Pontiac.

Officials of GM's Truck&Bus Group, which oversees the plant in Pontiac, said they were conducting an internal investigation.

The charges were reported by The Oakland Press, a Pontiac newspaper that interviewed unidentified workers at the plant.

"This is the first time I've heard of it," said Hayes, U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Michigan. "I'll have to discuss this with my staff. We'll have to look into it and make a decision" about whether to investigate further.

The reports of possible odometer fraud at GM, first published over the weekend, follow the June 24 indictment of Chrysler Corp. in St. Louis on odometer fraud charges for testing vehicles with disconnected odometers.

Chrysler Chairman Lee Iacocca last week apologized for the practice and promised to extend warranties on about 60,000 tested cars and to replace 40 that were damaged in testing, repaired and sold as new.

At GM's Pontiac West truck plant, where workers said they replaced and later rolled back odometers on trucks returned from overnight drives, GM officials planned to begin questioning employees, said spokeswoman Kari Hulsey.

She declined to say what protection GM might offer workers who provide information. The workers who talked to The Oakland Press included a former group leader and three other employees, the newspaper said.

Rising premiums affect profession

MIAMI — Medical officials said Monday they do not believe a medical-malpractice insurance crunch was to blame for the deaths of two patients diverted to distant hospitals because others were short-staffed.

But they said the situation shows no prospects for immediate change and could be endangering lives as various specialists, citing fears of huge malpractice claims and soaring insurance rates, refused to take emergency cases because of the higher risks involved.

"We're in the midst of a very bad situation that has no quick-fix solution," said Dr. Thom Mayer, director of emergency medical services for a four-hospital group in Broward County. "So far, we've been able to dodge the bullets."

In one of the weekend cases, a Lauderdale Lakes woman with bladder cancer suffered apparent heart failure at home Sunday. Paramedics were at her house for 26 minutes, and her condition deteriorated during a 16-minute ambulance ride to Broward General Medical Center in Fort Lauderdale, Mayer said. It would have been a four-minute ride to the nearest hospital.

Asked after reviewing the patient's chart if the response time was a factor in her death, Mayer said, "Not at all."

In the other case, a pedestrian struck by a hit-run driver Saturday night suffered serious head and spleen injuries, authorities said. The victim was flown to Hollywood Memorial Hospital instead of two closer emergency rooms without surgeons.

Stephan: business cons area farmers

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan filed a lawsuit Monday in Shawnee County District Court against "con artists" in a Nevada firm which he accused of trying to bilk financially troubled farmers with a fraudulent loan scheme.

Stephan said the legal action against Common Title Bond and Trust of Carson City, Nev., was designed to drive the company out of Kansas. Besides its Nevada operations, the company has offices in Sacramento, Calif., and Osborne, in north-central Kansas.

No telephone listing was available for Common Title's office in Carson City. A call by The Associated Press to the company's Sacramento office for comment was taken by an answering machine.

In his lawsuit, Stephan asked the court to stop Common Title from operating in Kansas. He also wants restitution to be paid to any farmer who fell for the Common Title pitch and civil penalties assessed in each case.

"We believe Common Title Bond and Trust's offer to farmers is at least a violation of state consumer protection law," Stephan told a news conference. "Further, the company and its representatives have failed to comply with a subpoena we issued in an attempt to find more out about the company."

The company offered to issue the insolvent farmers bogus financial papers called "sight drafts" to pay off the farmers' debts and bank loans. Farmers were led to believe they were transferring the banks' loans to the Federal Reserve System. But the Federal Reserve System refuses to honor the papers and banks have been warned not to accept them.

Judge denies plea to lessen sentence

MANHATTAN — A Riley County District Court judge has refused to reduce a life prison term for a man convicted of rape and kidnapping in a 1986 attack on two University students.

Judge Jerry Mershon on Monday turned down the request of Norvell Glover, 43, of Randolph, who was sentenced in March to life in prison for aggravated kidnap and 15 years to life for rape. The judge said a state diagnostic report recommended that Glover receive a lengthy prison term.

Glover's lawyer asked the judge to amend his order to allow the sentences to be served concurrently. Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy argued against amending the sentence and noted that Glover had been convicted of similar crimes in Nebraska.

Authorities said Glover had served 4½ years of a six-year prison sentence imposed in 1980 for first-degree sexual assault in Madison County, Neb.

Treadmills helping in horse diagnosis

By ALISON NEELY
Collegian Reporter

While most humans use the treadmill as a means of exercise, horses at K-State walk, trot and run on it for experimental reasons.

As in humans, animals often have diseases or weakened body parts not visible to the naked eye. Only through exercise can some ailments be detected.

A horse is like a finely tuned race car. It is forever requiring constant attention, said Jerry Gillespie, professor and head of surgery and medicine.

"The human being is a good athlete, but the horse is far superior. The horse is built metabolically and physically to be a running athlete," Gillespie said.

Attaching instrumentation to a horse in its natural setting can be difficult, if not impossible, he said. The treadmill can be used to determine what physiological changes occur inside a horse when it moves. When the horse is strapped in a harness and on the treadmill, all necessary tests can be run.

Almost always the heart rate, blood pressure and blood temperature are checked, said Denise Sours, veterinary technician. Depending on the experiments being conducted, almost everything about the horse can be measured.

"We can draw a blood sample, and run any test on it. We can even draw blood samples while he's running so we can measure all stages: running, resting and walking," Sours said.

Disease diagnosis is another function of the treadmill.

"We're in the stage now where we're beginning to recognize diseases in a horse in an earlier stage," Gillespie said.

The two most common problems with horses are lameness in the legs and respiratory diseases, he said.

"Horses really vary in levels of discomfort. Like with people, there are different levels of pain that horses endure," Gillespie said.

He said making a horse accustomed to a treadmill is easy. The first day the horse is twice left standing in the room with the treadmill for several minutes each time. In the next three to four days, the horse walks on the treadmill several times, followed by four to five days of trotting. By the end of the 10-day period, the horse is galloping along quite happily.

Regents approve mission funding

By PAT HUND
Editor

The Kansas Board of Regents approved funding for the mission-related enhancement programs of K-State at its June 26 meeting in Topeka.

In a separate request, James Coffman, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the Board of Regents allowed the Veterinary Medical Center $660,000 for its enhancement programs and program maintenance.

As part of the three-year plan, the Board of Regents approved a package that will allocate $3.74 million to the University each fiscal year from 1989-91.

Two million dollars will help the University achieve 100 percent economic parity with other peer universities in terms of salary scheduling, said Tom Schellhardt, vice president for administration and finance.

In addition, $1.74 million will be directed to mission-related enhancement programs to achieve 95 percent parity with peer institutions. The plan includes improving economic development in Kansas, undergraduate instruction and access to University services and strengthening the University's contribution to scientific research and development.

"(The decision for) funding the mission-related enhancement programs came from the (individual) colleges' five-year strategic plan," Schellhardt said.

The Board of Regents also approved the general budget for the University. If approved by the Legislature, the general University budget will have about $104 million as a base for fiscal 1989.

While the Board of Regents accepted President Jon Wefald's request for the mission-related enhancement program, Coffman, now acting provost, said the Veterinary Medical Center and the Board of Regents agreed to a compromise in funding for the mission-related programs.

Originally, the Board of Regents proposed to allocate $300,000 to the Vet Center while Coffman said he requested about $985,000. Later, it adjusted the figure to $450,000. The final agreed to figure was $660,000 for each fiscal year from 1989-91.

"We view it as the absolute bare minimum related to our need to maintain accreditation," Coffman said.

Part of the funding will also bring the faculty salary to 100 percent parity with other veterinary colleges by fiscal year 1991.

The mission-related enhancement program in the Veterinary Center calls for funding nine faculty positions, four veterinary technicians and operating funds of $100,000 to support them for fiscal 1989, Coffman said.

In fiscal 1990, eight more faculty positions and four medical technologists will be added.

Coffman said two variables were unique to the Veterinary Medical Center's request for mission-related program funding. The Center is in the third year of a four-year plan to double tuition, and it is involved in a major program enhancement process to maintain

Increased staff first priority for meeting vet-med mission

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

Editor's Note: This is the sixth in a nine-part series dealing with the University's colleges.

According to its five-year strategic plan, the College of Veterinary Medicine's first priority is obtaining a staff whose size and competency can match its mission of instruction, research and public service.

"Our main thrust is to correct our man-power deficit," said James Coffman, dean of the college and acting provost. "In addition, we need the operating funds to support those faculty."

The college has been attempting to fill 90 faculty positions that have been authorized since 1983. The funds available in 1983, however, would only sustain 60 faculty positions. To date, the college has filled 13 positions, leaving a deficit of 77, Coffman said.

The planning study said "staff of this size is essential, given the relatively large enrollment and multiple missions of the college."

Recommendations recently made by the American Veterinary Medical Association Council on Education emphasized the importance of filling the 90 faculty positions and the 17 classified technical assistants required to support them, Coffman said.

"Of the 17 classified positions, eight have been filled and nine remain open," he said.

The main reason for the focus on staffing improvements is to stay on track with the guidelines for accreditation, Coffman said.

"We're accredited for up to three years," he said. "If we can continue to show progress, we are accredited through fiscal year 1989."

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

The strategic plan said of the 27 veterinary colleges in the country, K-State ranks 24th in its professor salaries and 25th in salaries for associate professors. The student/faculty ratio ranks 26th. Also, of the 13 colleges which have a diagnostic laboratory, K-State is 11th in terms of state support.

Coffman said complimentary to the college's goal of staffing enhancement is a commitment to the joint program between the Veterinary Medical Center and the state of Nebraska.

"We have an agreement that allows 24 students to enroll from Nebraska at the in-state tuition rate," he said.

As part of the cooperative program, Nebraska pays 77 percent of a contractual fee set by the Western Interstate Commission on Higher Education. The fee paid by Nebraska in 1987 was $16,700. Coffman said the amount is projected to be $17,100 for the coming year.

The reciprocity allows one representative from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln to be a member of the curriculum committee, and dictates the same admissions guidelines and procedures must be followed for Nebraska students.

"The final element is that (UNL) will build and staff a clinical service and teaching center at Clay Center, Kan., with a 20-person dormitory," Coffman said. "This facility will be available to any student in the K-State program at no additional tuition cost."

Coffman said the reciprocal use of facilities between UNL and K-State "will expand our instruction and research capacity."

Another cooperative relationship exists between the faculties in the Veterinary Medical Center and those in the University of Kansas Medical Center.

"This program is aimed at creating synergy in research by the transfer of related technologies between laboratories," Coffman said. "It allows for the joint use of scarce resources."

To achieve this purpose, the strategic plan proposes five activities: establishing a support unit for obtaining research grants, creating an interdisciplinary doctoral program, supporting an interinstitutional program that cross-trains students to work with animal medicine in a medical center environment, funding pilot research studies in biotechnology and allowing traveling semester fellowships.

"We want to solidify and augment the cooperative program with KU in the future," Coffman said.

Art gallery displays 'private' work

By The Collegian Staff

Drawings and Collage Constructions by Larry Peters, Topeka, is the next exhibit in the Union Art Gallery. It will run through July 31.

"My work is at times more or less autobiographical and somewhat personal or private in nature," Peters said. "Some of the titles may give evidence of my thoughts and others may not."

Peters received his bachelor's degree from Washburn University of Topeka and his master's degree from Southern Illinois University. He is currently the Gallery director/curator of collections for the Gallery of Fine Arts at the Topeka Public Library.

"Often works may show a mood or feeling by the colors selected and by motion. In some pieces I have made a strong personal statement that may go unnoticed by the casual viewer, as the work should not be telling everything."

Peters has exhibited his work at the Nelson-Atkins Gallery in Kansas City, Mo., the Jan Weiner Gallery in Topeka and in the North Coast College Society juried exhibition.

"The Union Program Council student arts committee selects artists to display their work," said Marilyn Woodward, program adviser. "We feel very fortunate to have Mr. Peters' artwork displayed here at the University."

The Union Art Gallery is open 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Nominating moderate is reasonable solution

President Reagan's having another chance to nominate another Supreme Court justice has raised the battle of liberalism vs. conservatism another time.

This time, the battle took on new fervor with the nomination of Robert Bork to replace Justice Lewis Powell.

Of course, Reagan is singing his swan-song, with less than two years left in office. He needed to nominate someone to carry on the Republican legacy, just in case the unspeakable should take place. The Republican Party would not have accepted a non-conservative candidate to fight its battles in the court, and the Democratic Party will not accept a nominee without at least a few liberal tendencies.

Powell was respected and acceptable to both Republicans and Democrats. Although Powell is conservative by nature, he brought to the high court a tendency to be liberal. His open-mindedness enabled him to provide the swing vote in several instances, such as a ruling in 1973 confirming that women have a constitutional right to an abortion.

Bork, on the other hand, is deeply and devotedly a conservative, with no indication of the open mind which graced the court under Powell's presence. The Democrats have pledged to give Bork's qualifications thorough scrutiny, a process which, in fact, means a fight to the death.

So, Reagan should have nominated a moderate, someone with the highest of qualifications who could meet the standards of both parties, perhaps simply by being open-minded about his or her job. But he didn't. If the Democratic majority should prevail — which is likely — and Bork's nomination be turned down, Reagan would have to give serious contemplation to appointing an equally (if not more) qualified nominee to do the job — one who has qualities which Democrats and/or liberals will find appealing.

One aspect to keep in mind about all this hoopla is that "two can play this game." Any candidate a Democrat finds too conservative or Republican in ideology can be eliminated.

In truth, politics should not influence such a decision at all. The job should go to the nominee most qualified to fill a job of such national importance. Barring this ideal, the job needs to be given to a nominee who can balance the demands of two political entities, while serving country and conscience at the same time.

FCC regulations violate rights

Now that the fervor over the Fourth of July has faded a little, the country gets back to the daily enactment of the principles of the Constitution. Often citizens respond to the Constitution as if once this document was written all the struggles were over and the United States emerged pristine and perfect from the War for Independence. However, documents have been written in the past promising freedoms without achieving them. We should remember that the same thing can happen with our Constitution.

Even if the Constitution was perfect as written — a shaky assumption at best considering amendments that have been necessary — the real test of the document is in whether the principles are carried out by the people who interpret it. Politicians realize this — witness the high feelings on their part about the nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court.

One issue that strikes at the heart of our society is the issue of free speech and the regulation of the press. The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble..." Despite the fact that the Constitution is quite specific on the subject, there are still elements in our country that wish to restrict the freedom of the press. They range from the noisy religious right to the quiet bureaucrats of the Federal Communications Commission.

We had an example of the religious right in town recently. Exercising their First Amendment rights, the Manhattan Chapter of the National Federation for Decency assembled at the Holiday Inn to protest "soft-core porn" movies available for rent there. The people involved are well-meaning and have good intentions. Nonetheless, their good intentions are a step toward restriction of freedom. I certainly would not question their right to boycott Holiday Inn and to express their opinion that others should as well. However, I would question the underlying assumptions of their actions.

A free press should not be viewed simply as what you read in the papers. It consists of the citizen's freedom of access to information. Through the boycott of Holiday Inn, the Federation for Decency attempts to restrict this access. A free society would let the consumer make his or her own decision in the hotel room. The Federation wishes to have the decision made by Holiday Inn for the consumer.

As long as this call for "decency" is played out in the marketplace it is safe enough. The real danger comes when the issue is taken one step further through laws about obscenity and the press. This is when the question is not whether we can turn our television sets on or off, but whether certain types of information are even going to be on the set at all. The true villains of this story are not the noisy religious right (they are acting as citizens, which is their right) but the quiet bureaucrats of the FCC.

As of April 29 the FCC has issued new guidelines as to what can be broadcast on the air. Previously, if material was considered obscene or indecent, stations were able to broadcast it at certain times of the day. The rule of thumb was that doing so was acceptable after 10 p.m. Now, however, the broadcast is prohibited at all times. Specifically what is prohibited is material that is obscene or indecent. A distinction is made between obscene and indecent material.

Obscenity is defined from the standpoint of 1) Whether the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find the work, taken as a whole, appeals to prurient interest, 2) Whether the work describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the state law, and 3) Whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific values. All three items must be taken into consideration when determining obscenity.

Indecency is the broadcast of language that describes in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities and organs. The FCC, not the local community, determines what the community standard is. In addition, indecent language can not be redeemed by a claim that it has literary, artistic, political or scientific value.

Two questions need to be answered in reference to these guidelines. If obscene material is redeemed because of literary, artistic, political or social merit, who determines this redemption? Surely the writers of the Constitution did not intend that government should be in the business of making this decision when they guaranteed a free press. Yet this is exactly the result of the obscenity guidelines.

In regard to indecency, the impact of these guidelines is even more dangerous. Even if the work has merit, it can be kept off the air. The FCC has inserted its finger into what we are allowed to hear on the airwaves. It is no longer our choice or the choice of the purveyor of information but the choice of a governmental institution. Again, this is not what the framers of the Constitution had in mind.

The implications of this are frightening. Unfortunately, this is not an abstract discussion about a radio station in New York City. These guidelines are national and have already affected the campus station, KSDB. There is the possibility of criminal prosecution of station announcers, managers and, in the case of a student station, even the Board of Regents. Currently, an announcer at the University of California at Santa Barbara faces a two- to five-year prison sentence if convicted, and the Board of Regents of California faces a $20,000 fine. This is a sure recipe for stifling expression.

The result in Manhattan is that KSDB has had to become careful about what it broadcasts and as a result has issued guidelines for its announcers. They have been forced to do this because of the FCC guidelines even though it reduces the alternative nature of the station. This was undoubtedly a factor in the removal of the punk specialty show.

Whether one likes obscenity or not is irrelevant. Whether one likes a free press and a free flow of information is not. If the United States wishes to have reason for priding itself on its freedom, regulations of the sort propagated by the FCC need to be abandoned.

Editor,

Wow!
In a recent article in the Collegian, the K-State library lamented that the lowering of the U.S. dollar value is hurting our foreign journal subscriptions. I am sure it is true. However, when the dean of libraries was quoted as saying that one U.S. dollar is now only 0.5 German mark that really caught my attention since I was in Germany only a few months ago and the exchange rate was 1.8 mark to the dollar. I called a local bank today (July 1) and found out that the exchange rate is still 1.824 mark to the dollar. I hope in the future such numbers could be checked before the article goes to press. I thought I was going to make a fast buck from the few German marks I still have in my coin box.

Deadly chemicals

Editor,

Environmentalists take note. You might be surprised to learn that the Army Corps of Engineers, at lakes such as Tuttle Creek and Milford, is eradicating wildflowers and other vegetation this summer. They are using chemicals containing herbicide 2,4-D, while the actual spraying is being done by small companies under contract to the Corps.

Still widely used in the Flint Hills, 2,4-D may be underestimated in its toxic effects to fish and aquatic life, and in its health hazard to humans. It is a persistent herbicide which runs off when it rains, gets into streams and lakes and concentrates in the biological food chain.

Hasn't the Corps of Engineers at these lakes got their priorities mixed up? Spraying has or will soon take place on the lower face of the dam at Milford Lake, to eradicate patches of otherwise innocuous sumac. Sumac (this isn't poison sumac) is an important winter food for wildlife, and bluebirds have repeatedly been seen feeding in this sumac. Many other seeds of "weeds" are used similarly by other songbirds. Nearby is a "bluebird trail," a row of eight or 10 bluebird nesting boxes placed and maintained by local Scout groups. And, this location is right next to the planned Milford "Conservation Education" Center.

At Milford, runoff from herbicide spraying goes into little creeks which feed into Milford Fish Hatchery water supplies, and feed to a swimming beach and into the Republican River near Junction City. People swim, fish and seine in the Republican.

The Corps of Engineers is supposed to improve and preserve the environment, not destroy it. Shouldn't the Corps be spending its money (our money) on beneficial projects like historical and nature trails, natural area preservation and archaeological digs instead of contracting out the destruction of wildflowers, woody plants and grasses? Incidentally, those king of beneficial projects are common at other Corps lakes.

Technicians to do worthwhile kinds of projects cost about the same as spraying herbicides to eradicate plant life valuable to wildlife and song birds.

Finally, you can say goodbye to a small but beautiful wet area next to the outlet tube at Milford. It had pools of water with interesting aquatic life, marshy vegetation including cattails and cardinal flower and various marsh-loving interesting insects. Insect-eating birds were known to come to the place for food. Recently, a drainage pipe was installed in the tiny marsh and gravel was dumped in on top for "better" public access to fishing.

'Egoism' destroying education

People without insight into social and historical affairs tend to believe that whether their lives are happy or not depends largely upon individual matters. They perceive that satisfaction with such personal matters as health, career choice and private and social human relationships are the most important determinants of their welfare.

This narrow perspective reflects a lack of historical sense and an inability to understand social contexts. I term this narrowly individualistic attitude "degraded egoism." People who stick to degraded egoism do not know and do not care where the society is going and where the society ought to go, so long as society does not interfere with their individual lives.

Much to our regret, in American society this morbid mentality is increasingly permeating our colleges and universities.

"Throughout the country," says Norman Cousins in his essay "How to make people smaller than they are," "schools are under pressure to become job-training centers and employment agencies...."

This dominant careerism reflects an increasing tension in the job market which comes from two national phenomena — the growing number of college graduates and a sluggish economy. However, the mentality underlying careerism, I believe, is nothing but degraded egoism.

A more serious problem arises in that our colleges and universities are increasingly responsive to the demands of students and parents. Our colleges and universities are steadily growing more passive, attempting to meet the students' and parents' desires for job training rather than focusing on providing a well-rounded education.

There are two detrimental effects of the vocationalization of colleges and universities. In the first place, the exclusive emphasis on vocational and technical training nurtures students' shortsighted outlook on life and on the world. This training does not provide students with a sense of history and a broad view of life and society.

Secondly, the vocational training raises no ethical issues, making students virtually unaware of moral choices. It does not foster the sense of community responsibility, leading students not to care about their neighbors or their society. Instead, it nurtures vulgar individualism.

If this tendency toward vocationalism is further strengthened, the main function of our colleges and universities will become producing, in bulk, technicians and professionals who do not know and do not care where our society goes and where our society ought to be. Bluntly speaking, our colleges and universities shall be engaged in mass production of mechanical parts needed for the operation of the huge machine called society. Whoever manages this machine called society will be entrusted with an incredible amount of power.

There have been numerous arguments made for the regeneration of our educational system — a system that is under severe pressure to vocationalize. But to feel the desirability for reforms is one thing, and to take measures to implement reforms is quite another.

The direction of our system has a vital effect on our real lives. It is the choice of whether we regain our privilege granted in a free society to control and to take responsibility for our society with our collective wisdom, or whether we entrust our entire destiny to a handful of persons who are greedy for the public spotlight.

All of us must be determined to take pains to attack the widespread "degraded egoism" which demands vocational training exclusively, and motivate students toward true education.

Players, management, crowd mourn at Dick Howser Day

By PAT HUND

Sandwiched between a double-header sweep of the Toronto Blue Jays Friday, the Kansas City Royals' management, players and fans bid a final and tearful farewell to former manager Dick Howser, who died of brain cancer June 17.

Howser struggled 11 months after the first tumor was detected in July 1986 following his All-Star game victory, but his battle ended two weeks before he was to be inducted into the Royals Hall of Fame as part of Dick Howser Day.

Howser's jersey, No. 10, was the first number ever retired by the Royals. He was the fifth person inducted into the Royals Hall of Fame.

A loud and boisterous capacity crowd of 40,619 fell silent during ceremonies dedicated posthumously to Howser.

John Schuerholz, Royals general manager and a close friend of Howser, read a poem dedicated to him. Others paid tribute during the ceremonies.

"It was not only his baseball ability and leadership but what he showed the country in his courageous battle against cancer," said Ewing Kauffman, Royals co-owner.

"It's ironic that he started and finished his career in Kansas City," he said.

While playing for the Kansas City A's, Howser received Rookie-of-the-Year honors. In 1985, Howser led the Royals to the division pennant, American League championship and finally the World Series championship.

Kansas Gov. Mike Hayden and Missouri Gov. John Ashcroft both proclaimed July 3 "Dick Howser Day" in their respective states.

The most emotional moment during the ceremonies came when Nancy Howser, flanked by her two daughters, Jana and Jill, spoke on the Royals infield about the support Howser received during his fight against cancer.

"I really miss him tonight because he always did all the talking," Nancy said in a quivering but firm voice.

"There are a lot (of) caring people out there, and I think we heard (from) about all of them," she said. "You are the best fans a team could ever hope for."

Nancy, who has become a born-again Christian, openly professed her new faith.

"I hope one day we'll all be together again with Dick in God's Hall of Fame," she said to the applause of the crowd.

She also read several verses from the Bible.

Fred White, announcer on the Royals broadcast network, read a telegram sent by President Ronald Reagan.

"He was a teacher and leader, and his legacy will live forever among baseball fans and among all who saw the quiet heroism that was his," the telegram stated about "No one who sees the armbands worn by the Royals in his memory this year, or the 1985 championship banner in left-field, will ever forget him."

Before the second game, the Royals' players sported patches bearing Howser's name and uniform number in a circle.

The Dick Howser Memorial Scholarship to benefit students at St. Luke's Hospital also was established.

Some of the players admitted it was a special day at Royals Stadium — a day in honor of their former mentor.

"We wanted to play good (for Howser)," said right-hander Mark Gubicza, who won the first game, 6-4, with his fourth victory in a row. "It was a total team effort which exemplifies this day."

It was not entirely a solemn occasion, though.

Ace pitcher Bret Saberhagen, a noted prankster, doused Gubicza with a bucket of confetti during the post-game interview.

In the second game, the Royals fell behind early with a crowd somewhat subdued by the ceremonies honoring Howser.

"It reminded us of how much we'll miss him," said Mike Witt, security and crowd management officer. "He was a real inspiration."

The Royals fell behind early in the second game and trailed 4-2 in the eighth inning when Frank White scored on a sacrifice fly by Steve Balboni after he had doubled.

Then, White capped a two-run rally in the bottom of the ninth with a single to drive in George Brett, giving the Royals a hard-fought, come-from-behind 5-4 victory and a special double-header sweep.

Ushers for Royals find job a ball

By PAT HUND

Linda Hall may not make the millions that George Brett has performing at Royals Stadium, but she dons a royal blue uniform, ready for action at every Royals home game.

No, Hall is not an up-and-coming, power-hitting female phenom but an usher making $23.68 at each home game.

Hall, sophomore in architecture, is primarily responsible for seating fans in her section, which is behind the visiting team's dugout.

And she's having a ball. "People are so much fun," Hall said. "If the game gets boring, I can rely on the fans. Watching some of the things they do makes me laugh."

Hall, from Raytown, Mo., has worked at the stadium for three summers.

Working behind the opposing team's dugout allows Hall to meet players from other teams.

"She has met Mark Langston (pitcher for the Seattle Mariners)," said Sherri Cotton, an usher from Blue Springs, Mo.

Hall said she did indeed have words with Langston.

"He's a nice guy," she said, slightly blushing.

Hall is one of about 80 ushers at the Royals home games. She said ushers come to the ball park about two hours before the game to prepare.

Being at the stadium also gives her the chance to meet some of the Royals players.

"I've met (former Royal) Lynn Jones and Dan Quisenberry," she said. "Mostly I meet the ones who have been around the longest."

For anyone who has ever tried to find a seat at the stadium, ushers do play an important part in the game, and some were emotionally shaken by the ceremonies posthumously honoring former manager Dick Howser.

One usher cried openly and uncontrollably. Another usher who works in the section where Nancy Howser has season tickets baked cookies for her and delivered roses from a well-wisher.

Although Hall has seen her share of bums and drunks, she finds the game and the crowd enjoyable.

Hall must also contend with "seat-jumpers" — people who attempt to move in her section during the game, although their tickets are in a different section.

"This is a prime area for seat-jumpers," she said. "When there's a rain delay, they like to come here because there are a lot of empty seats."

Stadium policy requires ushers to retrieve any beach balls in their section. Hall said fans boo her when she takes the ball away — one aspect that she does not enjoy.

"I would get in trouble if I didn't," she said.

Cotton said one of her most memorable experiences came during the 1985 World Series. Beer thrown by a zealous Royals fan and confetti thrown by other fans mixed in her hair.

"I was mad at that guy," she said. "But now we get along great."

Student umpires sacrifice time, advance youth

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

A hot, sunny evening in almost any city finds children and parents nervously enjoying the pre-game excitement of Little League baseball.

Parents make last-minute adjustments on their video cameras while discussing the latest news about the neighbors.

Players toss baseballs back and forth or take a few practice swings with their favorite bat.

Behind the backstop, the coaches shake hands and listen as the umpires remind them, "All the rules are the same...got any questions?"

After the formalities, the lead-off batter takes his stance at the plate and the first pitch is thrown. As the game begins, so does the job of the umpire.

In Manhattan, that umpire is usually a K-State student.

According to Mike Buchanan, recreation supervisor for the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department, 75 percent of the umpires in the youth program are K-State students.

The job is appealing to college students because of the evening hours and per game wages of $9 for baseball and $5 for softball.

The evening work schedule allows umpires to attend classes or work during the day. Classes and tests can create problems in scheduling when the umpires work, said Gary Marstall, supervisor at CiCo Park.

"If we didn't have college kids, we wouldn't have umpires," he said.

"It's decent money for not too bad of work," said Daron Brown, senior in marketing.

This is Brown's fourth year as an umpire for the Cookie League (grades 4 and 5) at City Park. He also works with the youth league basketball and flag football programs.

Alan Marstall, junior in recreation administration and third-year supervisor of the Cookie League, said the players relate well to the college umpires — many of whom are involved in other MPRD youth programs.

"Because we're involved in different programs, it makes umpiring easier. It just takes a few days to remember the kid's names and it's easier to be friendly," he said.

Being friendly and having a good time is important in the youth program. The emphasis is on participation and recreation, not competition, Alan Marstall said.

The league adapts and develops rules to ensure everyone has the chance to play. One rule says every player must have the opportunity to play at least two innings per game. Another rule states if a player doesn't start one game, he must start the next or the team forfeits.

In the Cookie League, after ball four, the batter gets to hit the ball off of a tee rather than take a walk. Alan Marstall said the rule takes a lot of pressure off of the pitcher and prevents lopsided scores like 26-2 where one team walks in run after run.

Little League games are held Monday through Friday for six weeks. After the 12-game season, a single-elimination tournament is held. The umpires usually work two games per night and three nights a week.

The job of the umpire is to control the game, not to decide it, Gary Marstall said. He could only remember one game where an official's call determined the outcome of the game. The important thing is to make the right call as the umpire sees it, he said.

"No matter what call you make, half the people will like it, half the people won't," Alan Marstall said.

Scott Turner, junior in secondary education, said the players respect the umpires' judgments, but the fans like to disagree.

Turner, a second-year umpire and outfielder for K-State's baseball team, said being an umpire has changed his perspective about them.

"I know how they feel and can understand where they're coming from," he said.

The umpires develop a "team system" with their partners and a camaraderie in the group. Some umpires may think others are a little slow or inconsistent but they all get along pretty well, Alan Marstall said.

"We always dog on each other but we all know it's in good humor," he said.

All agreed the worst part was dealing with the parents.

"In the lower leagues, everybody wants their kid to be the next

Mark Imming, senior in finance, prepares to put on his face mask Monday evening at the ball diamonds in City Park during youth baseball. Several K-State students umpire. Imming has umpired for two years.

Mickey Mantle," Gary Marstall said.

The crowds don't always treat the umpires right but that is part of the game, said John Krchma, substitute supervisor at CiCo Park. "It almost means more to the parents sometimes."

However, Krchma said the job of umpiring was stressful enough not to do it if a person didn't enjoy it.

"There are some nights when the umps probably don't always go home and go right to sleep."

The friendly smile an umpire gives to a catcher after a close play at home plate, though, indicates the lost sleep probably doesn't matter.

As the season winds down and the tournament draw near, things will undoubtedly get a little tense for the players and umpires. Alan Marstall likes to remind people "nobody makes you play or coach."

"After it's all over, we want people to look back and say 'Hey, that was a good season.'"

Indians down Royals, 9-7; Sabes beaten

By The Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Cory Snyder, who earlier had a two-run homer, hit a grand slam with one out in the eighth inning Monday night, giving the Cleveland Indians a 9-7 decision over the Kansas City Royals and depriving Bret Saberhagen of his 15th victory.

Kansas City, which had a six-game winning streak snapped, led 6-5 after Danny Tartabull hit a three-run homer in the top of the eighth. Saberhagen, 14-3, pitching with three days rest for the first time this season, allowed leadoff singles to Julio Franco and Joe Carter and was relieved by Steve Farr.

Saberhagen was pitching on three days rest so that he would be rested for the All-Star game if chosen.

Pat Tabler struck out before Farr walked Mel Hall to load the bases. Snyder then smashed the first pitch over the center field fence for his 16th homer, giving Cleveland, which lost 17-0 to Chicago on Sunday, its third victory in the last 15 games.

Sammy Stewart, 1-1, won despite allowing the home run to Tartabull, the first batter he faced in relief of Steve Carlton. Carlton struck out six, with Bo Jackson, his final victim, marking his 4,100th career strikeout.

After an RBI groundout by George Brett in the ninth, Mark Huisman got his second save by getting the last out with the tying runs on second and third.

Carlton took a 5-3 lead and a four-hitter into the eighth inning before allowing a leadoff double to Kevin Seitzer and a single to Brett, which brought on Stewart. Tartabull followed with his 13th homer.

Franco had put Cleveland ahead 5-3 in the fifth with a two-run homer.

Snyder put Cleveland ahead 2-0 in the second inning with his 15th homer following a single by Tabler.

The Royals scored three runs in the third on Jackson's 18th homer, two walks, an RBI single by Seitzer and a sacrifice fly by Brett.

Cash dislikes Australian comparison

By The Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — Pat Cash, a product of the liberated 1980s, doesn't want to be compared with the Australians who built a tennis dynasty in the '50s, '60s and early '70s.

"I don't think Harry Hopman would wear a diamond in his ear," Cash, who does, said Monday in a reference to the late Australian coach, a tough taskmaster who developed most of his country's players 20 and 30 years ago.

"Tennis has become a bit more professional world. It's a completely different lifestyle now. It's a full-time job," said Cash.

On Sunday, Cash became the first Australian man to win Wimbledon since John Newcombe captured the title in 1971. Newcombe was the last in a long string of champions from Down Under although Ken Rosewall was the last to make the Wimbledon finals, losing to American Jimmy Connors in 1974.

Although Cash said he had no heroes when he began playing tennis, the names of Newcombe, Rod Laver, Roy Emerson, Neale Fraser, Lew Hoad, Norman Brooks and Ashley Cooper, among others, gave him a thrill at Sunday night's champions dinner.

Still, he said, things are different these days.

"I'm in a different era than those guys," Cash said Monday, a day after his 7-6, 6-2, 7-5 victory over Czechoslovakia's Ivan Lendl. "The way I play and the way I live is different."

Of his victory in the world's most prestigious tournament, Cash said:

CAMPUS DEPARTMENTS: DON'T CUT ANYONE OUT OF THE KANSAS STATE CAMPUS DIRECTORY!

The goal of Student Publications is to have the most accurate campus directory possible. We need and appreciate your assistance in reaching this goal.

Be sure to include all office members you want listed in the Campus Offices section of the directory. Return the form you received from Student Publications for your department/unit listings to Kedzie Hall, Room 103 by JULY 10. If you have questions, call Shelly at 532-6555.

Individual faculty/staff name, title, address and telephone number changes should be made through the Personnel Office in Anderson Hall.

Salary

staff will get a share of the 3 percent increase. The figure is merely set as an average for each institution. Some University employees will not see an increase, while others may receive an increase of as much as 10 percent, Johnson said.

Allocating the increases is a process of merit-based evaluations by the department heads and college deans.

The faculty's input in the process is generally through Faculty Senate and its subcommittee on faculty salaries and fringe benefits. Each November, the subcommittee updates its statistics, comparing the salaries of K-State faculty to its five peer institutions and other Big Eight schools.

"We mail out 450 copies of the 20-page report," Schafer said. "It goes out to the governor, state legislators, the University president, the Board of Regents, the media and 40 alumni members who are designated as local spokesmen to their state representatives."

The governor met last year with the president of each university faculty senate to hear appeals for faculty salary increases as well as views on other topics.

Although it is difficult to measure the impact of the faculty senate report on salaries, Schafer said there were good responses to the documentation.

The process for deriving the salary figures for fiscal 1989 has already begun. On June 26, the Board of Regents voted to recommend a 5 percent increase for faculty positions.

The next step in the process is the proposal of the state's budget division to the governor in November.

accreditation, making the programs in the college more viable.

Coffman said the tuition costs are "well-below average of contiguous peer schools."

In comparison to other accredited veterinary colleges in fiscal 1986, K-State had comparably low tuition costs, he said.

For 1985, undergraduate tuition costs were as follows:

- K-State, $1,602;
- Oklahoma State University in Stillwater, $1,750;
- Iowa State University in Ames, $2,750;
- University of Colorado in Boulder, $3,550; and
- University of Missouri at Columbia, $3,000.

Contender claims qualified for post

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

Ron Hamm, first candidate for the position of assistant vice president for institutional advancement/University Relations, stressed his hands-on experience at each aspect of the job Monday during an open forum.

Addressing an open forum of 20 people, Hamm emphasized his 20 years of experience in fund raising, marketing, governmental relations, news and information services, publications and alumni activities as his strongest qualification for the position.

Hamm said he also prided himself on being a good communicator.

"I like to communicate; it's my job," he said.

His related experience includes serving on two presidential task forces that formulated programs to halt declining enrollments, coordinating President Lyndon B. Johnson's White House ceremony, working for the Associated Press and United Press International and launching three major advertising campaigns for Texas A&I in Kingsville and Texas Tech in Lubbock.

Switching from doing the job himself to delegating responsibilities is the only problem Hamm said he saw with the position.

"I plan to make a conscious effort to stand back and let the appointed people do their jobs while still being there if they should need my help," Hamm said.

Hamm said the position was a challenge because of K-State's declining enrollment, appointment of a new president and the neck-to-neck competition with the University of Kansas.

If appointed, Hamm said he would advertise K-State through every available forum. He said he would also practice public relations as "preventive medicine," making sure problems are solved before they cause any epidemics.

The other three candidates for the position will visit campus Tuesday through Thursday, each speaking at forums beginning at 1:30 in K-State Union 212.

Ceremony Center

The governor, the general and Brig. Gen. Myrna Williamson, commanding general of the Third ROTC Region, laid a wreath at the foot of the monument during the ceremony. Two U.S. Army buglers played taps, and 1st Infantry Division soldiers fired a 21-gun salute. The program concluded with F-4 Phantom jets from the Kansas Air National Guard unit in Topeka flying over the site in the "Missing Man" formation, symbolizing a plane lost in combat.

Jim Atkins, Junction City, president of the Kansas Operation Memorial, said they held an auction and a hog roast in February 1986.

The two events raised $2,100, but money wasn't being collected fast enough to reach the projected cost of $30,000. The dedication of the memorial was originally scheduled for July 4, 1986.

"We said when we got started on this thing there would be no turning back until we were finished," Atkins said. "When one door was closed to us, we just went on to the next door and opened that door."

The original price the group expected to pay was around $30,000. By the time the designs were finalized, the cost was more than $70,000, a high figure even for big thinkers, Atkins said.

Brockhouse said the education department is working to determine the locations and funding for each of the new centers this week. Brockhouse said he is uncertain as to when the final decisions will be made, but with luck, the centers will know whether to expect re-funding or non-existence before the regulations finally take effect.

There is now a 45-day period before the new regulations will go into effect. This grace period is set aside for Congress to discuss the regulations and make changes. The amount of time will be longer if Congress makes a special adjournment, Brockhouse said, and the summer recess this year will likely slow the process. The June 24 issue of Education Week magazine predicted that the grants will not be awarded until mid-August at the earliest.

Rankin said the centers will try to have the regulations changed back to include the original number of 40 centers. The centers have been strengthening political contacts in the hopes of achieving this.

"If the government thought we'd buy something that would put us out of work, they were highly mistaken," Rankin said. "The question is whether we have the political strength to reverse the regulations in time."

Rankin said there are two possible reasons for a decrease in the number of centers.

"The Department of Education may be exercising its control," Rankin said. "They may think, 'Congress provides the funding, but we'll decide what to do with it.'"

The education department is able to make administrative decisions of this nature because Congress only specifies the amount of funding to be made available, he said. Although the number of centers that must receive the funding has never been a congressional prerogative, Rankin said he hopes that may change.

Another possible reason for eliminating centers is a belief the funds can be put to better use elsewhere.

"Some people feel the problems of racism, sexism and bilingualism have been solved, but that isn't so," Rankin said.

Brockhouse said the decision was made for financial and programmatic reasons.

"The consolidation of programs should reduce costs," he said. "Instead of using funds for the administration of 40 centers, there will be more money for technical assistance and training, and for providing the actual fieldwork of the desegregation assistance center."

"One other important thing is to improve the DAC ability to provide coherent and comprehensive assistance over a long term in all three areas," Brockhouse said.

Moreover, Kingsley said the political climate has not favored desegregation since the Nixon administration.

"The Reagan administration has set a tone in this country which will take generations to overcome. He's fought affirmative action very hard," Kingsley said. "I would speculate that there is a very conservative bent in Washington, and the motivation isn't there to desegregate."

A decrease in the number of desegregation centers will send a message to school districts that the administration is not serious about desegregation, Kingsley said. The districts will take the move as a sign that slowing down action is acceptable.

"I just don't see the advantage to combining the centers, when they are all so different," Kingsley said. "Race is a totally different bag, and that is our specialty."

Kingsley said he hopes the Midwest center will be able to remain at K-State.

"Whatever happens, there would be a big disadvantage to having the center leave this University. Between the minorities collection, the library we have here in Bluemont (Hall) and campus expertise, we have tremendous resources here."

Rankin said K-State has as good a chance as any institution of keeping the Midwest center.

If you own or are thinking of owning a personal computer with a fixed disk drive, don't. Because the Leading Edge® Infinite Memory System™ is about to make it obsolete.

The Infinite Memory System is a fully configured Model "D" Personal Computer complete with one floppy disk drive, one Leading Edge® Infinite Memory Drive™, and two 20MB removable Leading Edge® Infinite Memory Cartridges™.

That's right, removable 20MB disk cartridges. When you fill 20 megabytes worth, simply pop in another 20MB cartridge and file the old one. When you hit the road, pop the disk cartridge into your briefcase and take it with you. The cartridges are about the same size as a floppy disk (only slightly thicker).

so they can be locked in desk drawers, even dropped in mailboxes. And because they utilize Bernoulli Technology™, access time is as fast or faster than most fixed disks.

All this, built into the very same personal computer that turned the industry on its side by offering the most thorough list of standard features ever offered. All this at an incredible $1995. With additional 20MB cartridges priced at only $49.95.

Could you use money from Home next semester?

Whether you're starting out for college or finishing up a graduate degree, there's one tough subject you'll have to face next semester.

Tuition.

The good news is, Home State Bank can help you find the money for college. Because just last year, more than 1,000 students received their low interest loans from us.

So, if you have an intense desire for that college diploma, come to Home State Bank. We have just the loan program for you.

Under the Guaranteed Student Loan program, for example, you don't need collateral, a cosigner, or an established credit rating. First and second-year students can receive up to $2,625 a year. For third and fourth-year students, up to $4,000 a year. You make no payments until six months after graduation or after you become a part-time student.

If you're studying in the health professions, there's a special HEAL loan program. And this year, our HEAL interest rate is the lowest in the Kansas City area.

In addition, some students receive Supplemental Loans for Students (SLS), and parents of undergraduates can receive loans for college costs through the Parent Loans program.

To receive your student loan application, call Connie Holmes at 321-3333. Your application will be processed and mailed to the school of your choice within 10 days.

Now, isn't that a good reason to call Home?

Plan set for pool, park construction

By ANGELA MARKLEY
Collegian Reporter

The Quality of Life bond issue passed in August 1986 by Riley County voters is beginning to take shape in the forms of swimming pools and a nature trail.

The issue called for $2.7 million worth of improvements on six projects: West Anderson Recreation Sports Park, CiCo Park Pool, Northview Pool, Linear Park, the community building renovation at Fourth and Humboldt streets and an animal shelter in the industrial park.

Plans are now under way for the new $696,000 CiCo Park Pool, the $350,000 Northview Pool and the $451,000 Linear Park.

The CiCo pool will be a 25-meter

L-shaped pool with a diving well on one end containing 1- and 3-meter diving boards. Also included will be a wading and training pool and a fountain structure that will circulate the water and has steps on which people can sit.

"A full-service building is also being built on the site. The building will contain a basket check, restrooms, changing areas with showers, a pump house and a concessions stand, which will be accessible to both pool users and non-pool users," said Ron Fehr, assistant director of Manhattan Parks and Recreation.

"Construction began in May and is proceeding quite well. Several of the pool walls have Larger enrollment could hurt

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

University officials have predicted an enrollment increase could have negative short-term but positive long-term effects.

Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, predicted an increase of 600 to 900 freshmen and transfer students over last year, for the upcoming fall semester.

Though the increase would end an enrollment decline, it could also financially strain K-State temporarily.

Regents' universities turn over the fees they collected during enrollment to the state. The money is placed in a general fund and rationed to universities based on their enrollment in the previous two years.

Each fiscal year, the base budget is evaluated by the Legislature to adapt to enrollment fluctuations. In order for a university to qualify for additional funding, it must have

KU numbers raise concern

By The Collegian Staff

University of Kansas students are experiencing scheduling difficulties because of enrollment increases beginning two years ago, said Bruce Linddall, director of admissions.

From fall 1985 to fall 1986, the KU enrollment escalated between 1,000 and 1,100 students, he said. The increase strained KU's abilities to provide adequate resources for all of the additional students.

"I think the University of Kansas has done an excellent job of using their resources, but it's obviously hard using the same number of resources for a greater number of students," Linddall said.

Overcrowding in classrooms created the need for opening addi-reported an enrollment increase during the previous year that caused additional costs of more than 0.5 percent of the base budget, said Marvin Burris, regents associate director for budget. On the other hand, if a university suffers an enrollment decline more than 2.5 percent of its base budget, its budget would be reduced for the following fiscal year.

The financial difficulties are caused by the lag of time between the academic year of the university and fiscal year of the state, which means universities may need alternative funding until monies are released, Burris said. To help compensate for the problem, the state can allow universities to keep money generated from extra students.

Don Hoyt, director of planning and evaluation services, said an enrollment increase could be a problem if the state denies the request to keep a percentage of the additional fees or the additional fees granted aren't enough. This was the case for the University of Kansas last year. KU solved the problem by borrowing needed funds from the following semester's budget.

Enrollment predictions at K-State were made based on increased room deposits and applications, which Hoyt said may not be a good indicator.

"We know that students apply to four or five schools," he said. "It's tricky to forecast; we don't know if enrollment will increase yet."

Professional illustrator enjoying city

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

His brush strokes have been viewed unknowingly by many people on posters, calendars and newspaper features.

Tom Bookwalter, a professional illustrator, free-lances for clients such as AT&T, Josten's Printing and Publishing Co., The Washington Post, National Football League and Shell Oil.

Bookwalter said he grew up north of Marysville and recently has come to Manhattan to free-lance.

"It's just a nice city," Bookwalter said. "Really, the reason I moved here is I think Manhattan kind of fits my lifestyle."

When he moved to Manhattan, Bookwalter contacted Charles Stroh, professor and head of the Department of Art, to ask about teaching at K-State.

"We're particularly lucky to have someone with his professional reputation in illustration living in Manhattan," Stroh said. "That's quite a distance from any of the major markets he works in across the country."

Having worked as an illustrator all of his life, Bookwalter said he has never taught a class before but is eager to try.

"I think I have something to offer here because I'm a professional every day and can tell the class what it really takes," he said.

Bookwalter began teaching a 22-student workshop in advanced commercial illustration at K-State on Monday. The number of seats in the four-week class is limited to allow for plenty of one-to-one instruction. Bookwalter is assisting the students with two projects: a magazine cover and a montage, which is a multi-image illustration of unrelated elements.

"He had to put aside some of his demanding clients and deadlines in order to make a time commitment to this workshop," Stroh said. "And we're certainly grateful."

The main thing Bookwalter wants to relate to his class is how to make a living with illustration in Manhattan. He suggests that graduates start by working for a printing company, ad agency or studio to learn the business aspects.

"It is a fun profession, but it takes a long time to get to the point where you are in enough demand that you can pick and choose and free-lance," Bookwalter said.

In October 1986, Bookwalter said he quit his job as a staff illustrator to begin working for himself. These days, instead of sitting around in a studio to sketch, he can go to the pool and do the same thing.

"Consequently, my friends think I don't work," he said. "I generally work from 30 to 40 hours in an average week, and there are some weeks when I work 60 hours."

Bookwalter said his steady work load is the result of his seven representatives locating jobs for him in cities such as Chicago, Houston, Denver, Dallas, Minneapolis and St. Louis, Mo.

"I also have one rep in Kalamazoo, Mich.," he said. "Surprisingly, that is a pretty good area for me."

Lafene improving despite budget cuts

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

After experiencing a financial crisis, Lafene Student Health Center is in the process of making some changes to improve the efficiency and feasibility of its operation.

For the past two years, Lafene has been operating at a deficit because of a decrease in student enrollment and the lack of use of certain facilities, said Eric Muehleisen, administrative officer at Lafene.

"But now, for the first time in two years, we're operating in the black," Muehleisen said. "Now we can concentrate on doing some long-range planning instead of reacting to crisis situations."

Those crisis situations were operating at a deficit of $176,000 in fiscal 1986. During this time period, the Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee composed a list of recommendations for Lafene in order to cut costs, said Doug Oetinger, chairman of the seven-member committee and senior in business.

"Most of the recommendations have been looked into and implemented," Oetinger said.

Some of the recommendations that were followed included raising student health fees from $55 to $60, cutting out meal services and closing the in-patient facilities during the summer months, he said.

"Because of these cuts and the stabilization of enrollment, we are now out of the red," Muehleisen said.

In fiscal 1987, Muehleisen estimated Lafene cleared between $20,000 and $30,000.

Economic stability for fiscal 1988 has improved the outlook at Lafene, but Oetinger remains cautiously optimistic.

"Even though things look better for Lafene right now, that's no reason we still shouldn't be careful," Oetinger said. "Something could come up, like the need for equipment, that we might not be able to handle financially."

Another recommendation the committee made was hiring a consulting firm to study Lafene's operation and give professional advice about how Lafene could make improvements.

"The recommendation of hiring the consultant firm is a reaction to what was a crisis situation. It still needs to be determined if it is something we really need to do," Muehleisen said.

Because the recommendations implemented have eased the financial crisis, both Muehleisen and Oetinger said a consulting firm might not be needed.

"We're pretty sure they will recommend closing the in-patient facility permanently because of its lack of use," Muehleisen said.

"There has been an underutilization of those facilities. It costs a lot more to maintain a staff and keep those services running than they are actually used," he said.

If the in-patient services, which contain 10 hospital beds and a nursing staff, were closed permanently, Muehleisen said one or two of the beds would be kept for observation purposes, but the daily nursing staff would be cut.

Muehleisen said the in-patient facility, which is not open during the summer, is being used less than it has been in the past.

In fiscal 1986, 128 people were admitted to the facility, but in fiscal 1987 only 94 people used the facility — a decrease of 34 admissions.

One reason for the diminished use of the facility is that improvements in medicine and treatments of illnesses have led to a decrease in in-patient services nationwide, Muehleisen said.

When it was built in 1959, Lafene was equipped with a 40-bed in-patient hospital, and since then the length and number of stays in hospitals have decreased, which has diminished the need for the facility.

Muehleisen said elimination of the in-patient facility and the 24-hour emergency service would save about $125,000 a year.

The emergency service has also not been cost-effective in the past because of labor costs and diminished use, he said.

If the service was terminated, Lafene clinic hours could be expanded — something Muehleisen said he believes would provide a greater benefit to students.

Muehleisen said other variables such as student health insurance must also be considered when the decision is made because the final action of eliminating services should be in the best interests of the students.

"It's not just a dollar-and-cents question," he said.

Even if in-patient services are eliminated, Muehleisen said other programs requested by students will be implemented.

"This past year, students were surveyed on their feelings about Lafene's services, how things could be improved and what services they wanted added," Muehleisen said. "Our committees are taking these results as suggestions for the possible uses in the empty in-patient facility."

Some of those possibilities include a cold clinic, where students with colds could come to Lafene and obtain medication without having to wait and see a doctor. Services for wellness and prevention education, including alcohol and drug abuse and sexually transmitted diseases, would also be expanded and developed, he said.

"Improving the quality of life with this type of wellness education is our obligation as an educational institution."

North admits to 'erroneous' testimony

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Oliver North admitted Wednesday that he had made "erroneous, misleading, evasive and wrong" statements to Congress to cover his role in helping Nicaraguan rebels while U.S. aid was forbidden by law.

"It was not right, it does not leave me with a good taste in my mouth," North, a Marine lieutenant colonel, told the joint House-Senate Iran-Contra committee. "I want you to know that lying does not come easy to me."

He said his choice was between lies and lives. However, he conceded under questioning from the committee's counsel, Nicaragua's Sandinista government was aware of the Contra-supply operation when he was misleading Congress in a briefing last summer.

In an emotional finale to an argument-filled second day of testimony, North said tens of thousands of people have written to him applauding his pivotal role in diverting profits from Iranian arms sales to help the rebels fighting the Nicaraguan government.

"I've made judgment errors," he said. "But I tried and I don't regret having done it."

He also refused to shoulder the entire blame.

"This Marine lieutenant colonel was not making those decisions on his own," North said. "I thought I had approval for everything I did."

His contention that members of congressional intelligence committees could not be trusted with secrets drew a sharp rebuke from Senate committee chairman Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii.

He said no secrets had ever leaked from the Senate intelligence committee during the eight years he served on it, and he added, "Most of the leaks in this city come from the other side of Pennsylvania (Avenue)," in an apparent reference to the White House.

No trace reddened as John Nields, who conducted the televised questioning from the investigating committees, ticked off a summary of events North had testified about:

"You and others put out a false version of facts relating to 1985 Hawk (missile) shipments. You altered documents in official NSC files. You shredded documents shortly after you heard representatives of the attorney general of the United States were coming into your office to review them. You wrote false and misleading letters to the Congress of the United States.... You received personal financial benefits, you were operating with covert funds without knowing where they came from.... $8 million in operating funds were handled in a manner where you didn't know what happened."

Hindu mob riots to avenge deaths

CHANDIGARH, India — Hindu mobs killed five Sikhs and injured another 87, burned their shops and stopped trains in lynchings attempts Wednesday to avenge 72 Hindu bus passengers massacred by Sikh separatists.

The army went on full alert in north India and New Delhi and the capital braced for violence as opposition parties called for a protest strike for today.

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi met with his Cabinet ministers and opposition politicians to discuss the crisis.

Authorities banned public assembly, shut down schools and ordered buses off the roads to prevent violence in New Delhi.

Sikhs are a minority in India but they have a slight majority in Punjab, a rich agricultural state in northern India that Gandhi placed under federal control in May. Militant members of the Sikh sect are fighting for a separate state in Punjab.

The attacks against Sikhs were in Hindu-dominated Haryana and Uttar Pradesh states in northern India.

Riot police shoot striking workers

SAN SALVADOR — Anti-riot police shot at striking Social Security workers trying to force their way into a government building Wednesday and at least 22 people including two journalists were injured, witnesses said.

The shooting occurred at the Social Security Institute in the capital.

Journalists said they counted at least 22 people either wounded by police gunfire or seriously hurt from being beaten. Police officers were also injured when strikers beat them with clubs, police officials said.

The National Workers' Union, which is backing the strikers, said through a spokesman that 15 strikers suffered bullet wounds and 50 received minor injuries, mainly from riot police truncheons.

The press office of the Salvadoran military, of which the police are a branch, said in a statement that the workers "ran at the police officers, hitting them clubs with spikes in them." It said "shots were heard" and that the officers then went into the crowd looking for the source of the shots.

Police Lt. Salvador Arias Ramos, head of one of the riot squads on the scene, said one police officer and seven of his men were injured by club blows from the strikers. The military press office said two policemen were wounded by bullets, but did not say how.

Eladio Cordova, a leader of the 5,000-strong Social Security Workers' Union, said he knew of eight workers being wounded by bullets, and that four members of the union leadership were injured when "they were beaten with rifle bullets."

State Department halts Marcos trip

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration has warned former Philippine President Ferdinand E. Marcos against engaging in an apparent plot to topple the Aquino government and barred him from leaving the Hawaiian island of Oahu, U.S. officials said Wednesday.

The warning was delivered to Marcos at his home in Honolulu by Abraham D. Sofaer, the State Department's legal adviser, and concerned "his activities which we believe violated the understandings under which he is permitted to remain a guest in the United States," said Charles E. Redman, the department spokesman.

Two other U.S. officials, who demanded anonymity, said the U.S. government had a tape of a conversation between Marcos and an arms dealer that indicated the former president was actively plotting to overthrow his successor, Corazon Aquino.

The Justice Department is expected to make some of these details public today.

"The United States is seriously concerned about indications that Mr. Marcos appeared to be seeking to destabilize the Aquino government and was contemplating a return to the Philippines without the express permission of the Philippine government," Redman said.

Marcos, who lives on Oahu, not only was barred from going home but also from leaving the area or going elsewhere in the United States, a Justice Department official, Pat Korten, said.

Senator rips Dole over flight safety

WASHINGTON — A senator told the secretary of transportation Wednesday to stop using "doubletalk and petty technicalities" and take serious steps to improve air safety and reduce airline delays.

But Transportation Secretary Elizabeth H. Dole, testifying before the Senate Appropriations Committee's transportation subcommittee, said her agency has been straightforward about its safety program and has adjusted its efforts wisely during a period of rapid air traffic growth.

The crossfire between Dole and Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., chairman of the subcommittee, was the latest in a series of skirmishes between Congress and the Transportation Department over safety in the nation's skies.

Many lawmakers have been resentful since the department's June 4 request to Congress to increase the number of air traffic controllers and supervisors by 955 by Sept. 30, 1988, the end of the 1988 fiscal year. Before that request, legislators had repeatedly urged the Federal Aviation Administration — a branch of the Transportation Department — to hire more controllers, only to be told they were not needed.

In addition, the FAA rejected a call in May by Jim Burnett, chief of the National Transportation Safety Board, to ease air traffic in the nation's busiest regions, only to reverse itself in June and adopt steps to reduce the congestion.

"For too long now, we have been subjected to a deliberate and persistent campaign of doubletalk and petty technicalities on some vitally important issues," Lautenberg told Dole. "We are tired of these word games and we hope they stop."

Dole told Lautenberg that the department decided it needed more controllers after a three-month study revealed that air traffic would increase by five to six percent in 1988, not the three to four percent previously estimated.

State GOP leader rues flier mailing

TOPEKA — State Republican Chairman Fred Logan said Wednesday he regretted the party mailed fliers touting the accomplishments of Gov. Mike Hayden to "a handful" of state employees at their work places.

Logan called it inadvertent that the fliers were mailed to them there, but said the GOP must "make every effort to avoid even the appearance of impropriety in all of our activities."

Democratic state Rep. Anthony Hensley of Topeka accused Hayden Tuesday of "blatantly contradicting" his own political code of conduct by mailing political brochures which promote himself and the GOP to state employees at their offices.

In a statement issued Wednesday through state Republican headquarters, Logan thanked Hensley for calling attention to the mailing, noting that in this instance "apparently we failed to notice that some addresses on several of our mailing lists were those of state offices."

Schools to benefit from new proposal

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

A joint proposal submitted to the Kansas Board of Regents by the College of Veterinary Medicine and the University of Kansas Medical School would enable each school to expand upon its own programs and take advantage of the other school's facilities, faculty and research.

James Coffman, dean of the college and acting provost, said the idea for the cooperative program has been under development since January.

The program would be one of several cooperative efforts between the two schools.

The colleges have a "substantial on-going relationship," Coffman said. This type of program creates a "two plus two equals 10" situation — meaning that both the KU Medical Center and the veterinary college benefit from cooperative efforts.

The veterinary college is involved in significant research with animals that might be applicable to human disease processes, he said. Moreover, the college offers facilities and faculty not available at the medical school to handle large animals.

In addition to having a wider range of in-depth studies, the KU medical school has instrumentation and technical support the veterinary college does not have, Coffman said.

The program will allow researchers to draw from the pool of faculty at both schools. The medical school has 400 faculty members while the veterinary college has 70.

As submitted, the proposal requested funding of $213,000 from K-State and $138,000 from KU. The target areas were:

— A four-year challenge grant to fund inter-institutional grant applications;

— Support the multi-disciplinary doctoral programs;

— Provide for a traveling semester fellowship;

— Allow transfer of graduate courses between colleges; and — Establish an administrative research coordinator's office to facilitate grant applications.

The regents modified the proposal to request funding of $77,000 from each institution and to prioritize the support of multi-disciplinary doctoral programs and the administrative research coordinator's office.

The aspects the regents prioritized are compatible with the total plan, but the other areas will not be de-emphasized, Coffman said.

If approved by the regents, the Legislature and Gov. Mike Hayden, the proposal would go into effect in July 1988.

The cooperative program fits well into the current program at the college, Coffman said. However, the first priority of the college is to fill existing faculty positions and augment the existing programs at K-State, he said.

Management, finance programs first priorities of business college

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

Editor's Note: This is the seventh in a nine-part series dealing with the five-year strategic plan of the University's colleges.

Enhancing the programs of management and finance as well as making faculty salaries more competitive are priorities in the strategic plan for the College of Business Administration.

Randolph Pohlman, dean of the college, said plans include introducing a class in management information systems and considering degree tracts in human resource management, production and operation management, information management and general management.

The college is also in the process of restructuring the master's of business administration degree to make it a self-contained two-year program for students who do not have an undergraduate degree in business.

The finance program has traditionally been strong, but funding needs to be allocated there to replace two faculty who have moved into the college's administration branch and one member who has left K-State, Pohlman said.

Replacing faculty members is difficult because of budget constraints, he said.

"We have to attempt to hire people in many areas at below-the-market prices for schools of this status," Pohlman said.

Because of the lower salaries,

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

the college must try to find people who have ties to the Midwest and are interested in teaching on a traditional campus like K-State, Pohlman said.

The college has recently faced what Pohlman described as the worst possible scenario — a growing college in a shrinking university.

The graduate programs in business administration and accountancy have grown by 300 percent since 1984. The undergraduate enrollment has increased by 9 percent since 1972.

Pohlman said it was important to increase enrollment to receive additional funding from the Kansas Board of Regents through the credit hour allocation system, but the students' best interests must be maintained.

"We're extremely concerned about the quality of education we can provide. We have not gotten resources commensurate with our growth," Pohlman said.

The enrollment increase has forced the undergraduate student-faculty ratio to grow from 35-to-1 in 1972 to 45-to-1 in 1987. Pohlman said class size has a major impact on the quality of education, but reducing the ratio to 35-to-1 would cost $700,000.

One part of the strategic plan's purpose is to link higher education to the state's economy. Pohlman said three aspects of the college give it a key role in the state's economic development.

The very nature of the education curriculum is business oriented. Moreover, both theoretical and applied research enhance the economic system. Finally, outreach programs such as the Small Business Development Center provide direct assistance to businesses.

SBDC works with an associate center at the Kansas Technological Institute at Salina to help businesses in a 15-county area.

The college also helps Kansas avoid "brain drain," Pohlman said. Seventy percent of the college's graduates find their first job in Kansas.

Other considerations in the five-year plan include adding a marketing class in professional selling, enhancing the personal financial planning area, maintaining and improving the student advising program and improving "an already outstanding accounting program," Pohlman said.

Undergraduates, departments benefit from jobs in research

Paula Spicer, senior in biochemistry, started washing glassware in a lab during her freshman year. Now, she is a senior with a research grant from the Center for Basic Cancer Research.

Spicer is not the only student whose interest in research was catalyzed by a job helping one of her professors with research. Many students decide to become scientists after participating as undergraduates in graduate research.

There are two reasons for hiring undergraduate students to contribute to research, said Robert Kruh, dean of the Graduate School. They may become stimulated to become researchers themselves — like Spicer. The other reason is monetary. The University does not have to pay undergraduates as much as other employees.

Undergraduates are helped by this experience even if their talents are limited.

"Research is different from sitting in class, listening to the professor drone on. It really gives them an opportunity to access their abilities," said John Iandolo, professor of biology. "This is especially true with letters of recommendation. Professors can say more than, 'He took my class,' by specifying what the student actually did."

An interest in organic chemistry led Robert Ostrander, senior in chemistry, to start research during his junior year. He asked Duy Hua, assistant professor of chemistry, for employment. Ostrander has now completed two half-year projects and is planning a third.

Ostrander started slowly by doing simpler reactions such as those at room temperature and normal pressure. As he became familiar with the instrumentation, he was allowed to do research involving more complicated instruments.

Rewards for Ostrander have included money, college credit and his name on papers. He said the work has helped him to get a "feel for research," and he plans to pursue a master's degree.

Julie Hagel, senior in microbiology, has been working for Ken Bayles, a graduate student in biology, for two months. Hagel, who receives college credit and money for her work, said she is benefiting from the lab experience as opposed to reading about it.

Professors can usually hire undergraduates only from their research grants budgets. If the grants are not large enough to cover all the expenses plus the undergraduates' help, the professors must go without. For this reason many professors cannot afford to hire undergraduates all the time.

Although most of the research money is for the physical sciences, some is available for other areas.

"The social sciences hire undergraduates also, but there are monetary problems," said Jarvin Emerson, professor of economics. Due to budget cuts, the Department of Economics' funding will restrict the number of undergraduates hired this fall and none will be hired in January 1988. There are no undergraduates working for the department this summer.

It takes about three years of working before the undergraduate can truly contribute.

"(We) don't take someone with little experience and expect major contributions, as opposed to just learning," Emerson said. As the undergraduates learn more, they become increasingly more valuable and are encouraged to return each year.

The system, however, is not foolproof. Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science, said when he has enough money, he hires undergraduates because he likes to introduce students to the research and make them part of the project.

Their duties — library research, data entry and looking up indexes — are "not particularly challenging," Unekis said, but some students have troubles. Often they do not have a working knowledge of Farrell Library and are unprepared to research broad topics. Other times they might not be proficient with a typewriter or word processor, he said.

"You never really know," Unekis said, "because undergraduates do not have resumes."

All seniors in the Department of Chemistry are encouraged to take one to two semesters of research courses. Peter Sherwood, associate professor of chemistry, said lab work is essential.

The Unfixed Fixed.

If you own or are thinking of owning a personal computer with a fixed disk drive, don't. Because the Leading Edge Infinite Memory System™ is about to make it obsolete.

The Infinite Memory System is a fully configured Model "D" Personal Computer complete with one floppy disk drive, one Leading Edge™ Infinite Memory Drive™, and two 20MB removable Leading Edge™ Infinite Memory Cartridges™.

That's right, removable 20MB disk cartridges.

When you fill 20 megabytes worth, simply pop in another 20MB cartridge and like the old one. When you hit the road, pop the disk cartridge into your briefcase and take it with you. The cartridges are about the same size as a floppy disk (only slightly thicker).

To the vacation of our dreams

One of the best things about summertime is the family vacation. Together, the family ventures into territories unknown, excited and delighted to be away from the year-long rut they've carved out for themselves.

But as summer college participants, we often miss out on this experience since we remain here in Manhattan. I'd like to change that today. For the next five minutes or so we will venture off on a trip of our own filled with excitement and education. We'll come back refreshed and ready to carve a new rut for the next 12 months.

Traveling with us on this trip are our friends Bob, Mary and Sue. They've decided to skip out on a week of summer classes to join us in our adventure. That makes five of us — in one car? Hardly. I've seen to it we travel in the plush comfort of a Plymouth Voyager mini-van, complete with more options than the University of Oklahoma backfield.

The Grand Canyon awaits us. Everyone packs a suitcase, and Bob volunteers to bring the entertainment for the drive, while Mary says she'll bring the snacks. It seems that everything is in perfect order.

After a brief squabble to determine who will ride in front with the driver (myself), we begin our journey. We soon find ourselves in Salina and realize no one has brought a map. Where is the Grand Canyon, anyway? We stop for a map and another brief squabble develops over who should pay for it. We all chip in, and once again we're off, heading toward southwestern Kansas.

By mid-afternoon everyone is bored. We yell to Bob for entertainment and he proudly announces that he's brought along a traveler's edition of Yahtzee and a deck of Uno cards. He admits that it's not much, but says the Trivial Pursuit pieces would've slid all over in a moving vehicle. Everyone calls Bob a dirty name.

Reluctantly, we agree to play Yahtzee. Bob opens the box with one pull, scattering the dice and scorecards everywhere. Two dice fly out an open window and we all watch in astonishment as they bounce frantically on the paved highway until they come to rest in a grassy ditch. Again, everyone calls Bob a dirty name.

Sue suggests strip Uno to entertain us. This idea is quickly rejected when Mary points out how difficult it would be with seatbelts on. No other suggestions are raised and slowly everyone abandons the idea of entertainment. Instead, we are all suddenly very hungry. Pass the pretzels and Pepsi.

Mary cringes when pretzels and Pepsi are mentioned. She opens her sack of goodies and pulls out a bag of wheat germ nuggets and mineral water. Those of us fond of pretzels and Pepsi suddenly realize it was a mistake to put a health food nut in charge of snacks.

A quick stop at a roadside gas station and we're stocked up on pretzels, licorice, lemon drops, potato chips, Ding Dongs and Snicker bars. Everyone is happy because at least now we're assured of a good lunch. Everyone, that is, except Mary, who sulks for the next 70 miles.

We stop for the night in Amarillo. So has every Shriner in Texas. The desk clerk tells us that there is some sort of semi-annual convention and that there are no rooms at any of the inns. Thirty miles west of town we spot a sleazy motel that flashes the vacancy beacon and we rejoice. Happily, we check in and rush to the pool for a swim before we go to sleep. To our disappointment the pool is a mysterious green color and the water is the texture of yogurt. We take showers instead and then drift off to dreamland.

In the morning we begin again, determined to make this trip successful. After driving halfway across New Mexico and seeing the same landscape that we've seen for the past six hours, Bob suggests we should have gone to Yellowstone — at least the drive would be nicer. Mary, still a tad upset, threatens Bob with the same fate as his Yahtzee dice.

The motel we stay in that night is beautiful and by mid-afternoon of the next day we arrive at the Grand Canyon. The trip is at a temporary end and to this point no one has been physically harmed by a fellow vacationer. Yes, indeed, all is well.

Over the next three days all of us stampede into souvenir stores, our traveler's checks in hand. We push and shove to get what we want, as do the other 500 tourists crammed into the shops. Mary even takes time out from the mayhem to stomp on the foot of a rowdy, unruly 7-year-old. This release of frustration drains all the hostility from her and she is back to being her pleasant self again.

Next, we pay $30 each to ride a mule down inside the canyon. This is curious because we all admit we wouldn't pay a single dime to ride a flea-bitten, smelly creature like this back home. There must be something about the Grand Canyon that makes a mule appealing — or a tourist stupid, one of the two.

The mule rides are fun and at the bottom of the canyon we once again storm the souvenir store. Mary is feeling so good that she suggests we, too, should try stomping on an unruly child. One by one we follow her advice and find it extremely pleasurable. Sue takes photos.

Soon, much to our dislike, we find it time to return home.

Mary has a quiz in three days and Bob a mid-term in five. We pack our suitcases and cram ourselves, along with our hoard of souvenirs, into the van.

We stop once more to see the canyon that's been carved from the earth by centuries of water and wind. It's a beautiful sight and we pose in front of it for a group photo.

It's been a good trip, despite its beginning, and in the spirit of camaraderie, we all agree to try a handful of Mary's wheat germ nuggets before we reach the New Mexico border.

Quietly, we return to the van and wedge ourselves between sacks of Arizona paraphernalia. We drive away, heading back to our respective ruts — such as doing the crossword puzzle, reading the comics or scanning the personal ads.

Safety belt ordinance lacks enforcing 'teeth'

On July 1, the next phase of the Kansas seatbelt law took effect. Now there are no longer warning citations given to motorists who are not wearing their seatbelts.

However, the seatbelt law remains an unticketable offense, meaning a driver cannot be pulled over simply because he is not wearing his seatbelt. Only after a driver is stopped for speeding, careless driving or some other moving violation, can the ordinance be enforced.

Consequently, this law has no teeth. It is not enforceable on its own merit and the fine for breaking the law is comparable to a parking ticket. The fine for driving without a seatbelt is only $10. If the state Legislature, via the citizens' mandate, is truly concerned about the safety of the populous then it needs to institute changes in the manner in which this ordinance is enforced.

Making the law ticketable on its own merit seems unlikely; those who view the law as infringing on personal rights simply would not allow it. Perhaps, then, an increase in the fine would be appropriate.

By increasing the fine, to, say $50, there is suddenly an incentive to use the belts, where currently there is practically none. For many people the thought of forfeiting $10 is an inconvenience, not a penalty. But with a fine of $50, suddenly something is at stake and it seems likely that more thought will be given to wearing the belts. This thought will lead to use and use will lead to safety. And so the goal of the law will be achieved.

If this approach seems unlikely also then the state Legislature should rethink its position on the seatbelt law and decide if it is truly needed at all.

New parking proposal only taking up space

Once again the vile issue of lack of campus parking threatens to disrupt University life.

To ward off this evil villain, the University Ad Hoc Committee on Parking Utilization developed a faulty weapon — a $2 parking fee for visitors to rest their weary vehicles.

This bright suggestion was defended as an alternative to raising the price of student parking permits.

The idea of charging visitors a minimal fee to park on campus all day is, in and of itself, not that appalling. But when one considers the trouble students and faculty who have parking permits encounter in trying to find a parking place, the charge seems unjust.

Asserting the right to charge a fee for use of a service assumes the service is readily available.

Yet a plan for installing University signs stated that about 90 percent of the nearly 12,000 inquiries at the Union parking lot visitor information center in April 1986 gave the Union as their destination. Thus, about 10,800 people probably wanted to park there in one month. It is highly doubtful that the Union parking lot could accommodate all of these visitors each month.

To require visitors to pay a fee that guarantees them nothing except a lighter billfold would damage the University's reputation in the eyes of prospective students and their parents.

In these lean years of recruitment and retention, that is something K-State can ill afford.

The parking plight needs to be solved, but this solution does not take into consideration the needs of visitors and the campus community.

conflict. The tour I was on arranged visits with Contras, Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras and with the anti-Sandinista internal opposition groups.

K-State students do not have to travel to Central America in order to become better informed about the region. They have many resources right here at their fingertips: courses in the departments of philosophy, sociology, modern languages and history, a vast collection of books, articles and audio and video tapes at the Farrell Library reserve desks, and frequent lectures.

Those who leave this university after four years believing the distortions concocted by Ronald Reagan and anti-communist religious groups have only themselves to blame.

Sandinistas only want freedom

Brian Jones' attack on the Sandinistas (Collegian, June 30) argues (1) that the Sandinistas willingly chose a "close alliance" with the Soviet Union, and (2) that the Sandinistas are guilty of "political suppression," "persecution of religious groups" and various "atrocities" against defenseless civilians.

Jones' conclusions rest on a familiar series of exaggerations, half-truths and outright falsehoods which he apparently absorbed from the Institute for Religion and Democracy. My response here examines the "facts" Jones offers to justify his claim about the alleged Nicaraguan-Soviet alliance. In a later column I will discuss the many inaccuracies in Jones' portrayal of the Sandinista human rights record.

Jones: "...the first month after the Sandinistas came to power they signed a military agreement with the Soviet Union."

Reality: After the July 1979 revolution, Nicaragua's need for military aid was urgent. Three thousand National Guardsmen had fled across the border into Honduras and had begun cross-border attacks into Nicaragua. From the first, the Guardsmen in Honduras were assisted by former CIA operatives and the Somocista exile community in Miami.

At the same time, U.S. aid to its right-wing client states in Central America escalated sharply, reaching $36 million in 1980. Soviet military aid to Nicaragua by comparison was minuscule, amounting to $6 million per year in 1979 and 1980. Nicaragua received significant amounts of eastern-bloc aid only after the CIA began organizing and directing the contra intervention in early 1981.

Jones: "The Carter administration offered arms and training to the Sandinistas. The offer was refused."

Reality: The Carter administration did offer arms — but only if Nicaraguan army officers were trained at the U.S. Army School of the Americas in Panama. Why did the Sandinistas decline? The school is where the United States trains the armies of right-wing dictatorships all over Latin America — and where Somoza had trained his National Guard. Because of this association, the school was anathema to Nicaraguans. Moreover, from a security standpoint, the Sandinistas knew that accepting the offer could mean suicide for the Nicaraguan revolution.

To let the United States — the world's foremost counterrevolutionary power — organize Nicaragua's new army and train its officers, would be to let the fox into the henhouse. The Sandinistas, therefore, proposed to receive U.S. arms without the training. This was refused by Carter.

Jones: "Nicaragua received $500 million to $1 billion annually in aid from the Soviet Union and currently has around 3,000 military advisers from eastern-bloc nations, most of them Cuban."

Reality: These figures are no doubt taken from U.S. government sources and hence cannot be trusted unless verified by some independent, politically neutral source, e.g. the London Institute for Strategic Studies. There is reason to believe Jones' figures wildly exaggerate the amount of Soviet and eastern-bloc military aid. The anti-Castro Cuban general who just defected to the United States stated emphatically in a Voice of America radio interview July 2 that Cuba has less than 300 military advisers in Nicaragua.

Jones: "Nicaragua was one of the 12 countries that 'stood behind the Soviets' when the United Nations voted to condemn the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan."

Reality: Unlike Cuba and the eastern-bloc countries who firmly supported Soviet intervention in Afghanistan by voting against the U.N. resolutions, Nicaragua has repeatedly abstained on this issue. So have other non-aligned nations such as India, Algeria and Zimbabwe. Jones might note that Nicaragua participated in the 1984 Olympics in Los Angeles, which were boycotted by the Soviet Union, Cuba and the eastern bloc.

A careful look at the record shows us, therefore, that Nicaragua is not as closely aligned with the Soviet bloc as Jones makes out. Moreover, it is plain that Nicaragua's reliance on Soviet aid was, from the very beginning, a response to U.S. hostility toward the Sandinista revolution — and to the long history of U.S. military, economic and political intervention against all progressive movements in Latin America.

No one should be surprised at Nicaragua's resort to Soviet arms. In the last seven years, the United States has organized bands of terrorists who have killed, wounded and kidnapped nearly 20,000 Nicaraguans. The most powerful nation on earth — the very nation whose Marines once occupied Nicaraguan soil for 20 years — recently mined Nicaragua's harbors, destroyed her oil supplies, regularly held war-like naval maneuvers off both of her coasts, flew over her skies at will with military aircraft and advertised detailed plans for the invasion and conquest of her territory.

If Jones really wants to see the end of Nicaragua's dependence on the Soviet Union, he should actively oppose our government's cruel and lawless aggression against a nation of 3 million impoverished peasants.

Editor's note: John Exdell is an associate professor of philosophy. He visited Nicaragua and Honduras in January 1987 with the delegation led by Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan.

Jones should tour

Editor,

According to Brian Jones, people who visit Nicaragua and report positively about the Sandinistas "have been taken on a guided tour and the government has let them see only what they wanted them to see."

Jones should travel to Nicaragua, as I have. He would enjoy unrestricted freedom to travel in the country, and he would discover that Nicaraguans feel free to express strong criticism of their government. North Americans who wish to see the country on scheduled tours can choose among scores of U.S.-based agencies and organizations that are entirely independent of the Nicaraguan government and who routinely put visitors in contact with all sides of the

Campers enjoy late night at Nick's

Stormy weather provides the perfect mood for "ghost camping" as lightning strikes behind the entrance to the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium. Four students camped out in hopes of coming in contact with a ghost named Nick, who haunts the theater.

'Haunted' theater provokes mystery

Most people are not very daring when it comes to dealing with the unknown. This was not the case when a group of K-State students ventured into the Purple Masque Theatre to spend a long and fearful night with Nick, the local poltergeist.

The four students arrived at the darkened theater shortly after 9 p.m. They brought with them the essentials for a long night of spirit-seeking: blankets, chips, chocolate and a cooler of pop.

After settling down on the theater stage, the lights were dimmed and the candles lit. In hushed voices, the adventurers told stories about Nick's previous antics — and his victims.

During the 1950s East Stadium, which now houses the Purple Masque Theatre, was an athletic dormitory. As the stories go, Nick was a football player who was injured during a game at the stadium. He was carried to the cafeteria and laid on a table where he died. Now his spirit haunts the theater.

His most active period was 1964-1969. During this time, he talked on tape machines, moved chairs and walked the halls of the theater. Other happenings attributed to Nick are clanging pipes, dimmed lights and vanishing costumes.

More recently Nick's activities are considered a bit more frightening by those involved. Charlotte MacFarland, instructor of speech, said he appeared in person to her and two others several years ago during a play rehearsal.

"The setting was perfect for something to happen," she said. It was a stormy night and the play was an extremely controversial one involving a lot of emotion between the two actresses. They had almost reached the climax when MacFarland looked at the doorway behind them. There she saw a man.

"It really shocked me, but it was dark in the Masque and I couldn't make out any features...he was definitely male," she said.

MacFarland asked him twice to leave before the actresses turned and saw him and screamed as they ran. At that point he vanished. She checked the hallway leading out, but found no one.

All three women thought it was a real man, and all agreed it was time to leave, MacFarland said.

"It was really creepy and we were scared, so we went down the hall holding hands," she said.

Although humans may be a bit wary when in the Purple Masque Theatre, there is one life form which exists there quite happily — Nicky the cat.

The theater students feed Nicky regularly. One student took the cat home during a vacation. The house was several miles away by Tuttle Creek State Park, but two days later Nicky was back in the theater.

MacFarland said Nicky just wandered in one day and has been there ever since. Some believe that Nick the ghost lives part time in the cat.

"It's a really wierd cat...she'll just jump at things or change personalities all of a sudden," she said.

The students who stayed the night said they thought Nick cohabitates with Nicky. When they asked, "Do you like Nicky?" during a session with the Ouija board, the pointer appeared to move toward the "yes" side of the board.

A Ouija board is a board marked with letters and numbers and a smaller board with a pointer, according to "Parapsychology: Sources of Information" by Rhea White and Laura Dale. The users place their fingertips on the edges of the smaller board, and then pose a question to the spirit. The movement of the pointer spells out the answer.

A Ouija board only works when the right combination of people use it, said Megan Garner, senior in theater. During the night, several couples tried before Nick appeared to respond.

Making contact with Nick produces certain bodily changes, said Kenyon Madden, former K-State student and one of the people who spent the night.

"You can tell when it's the right question. It's like something just goes right through you," he said. Another time Madden described the sensation to be that of chills up the back and across the shoulders.

The Ouija board was not the only evidence that Nick was present in the theater that night, some of the students claimed. Several of the campers heard footsteps in the corridor above the theater. This is not unusual, MacFarland said.

"That is really typical. Almost everyone who has worked in the Masque has heard them," she said.

Poltergeists 'freedoms' astound writers

Poltergeists and the human subconscious share one common element — freedom of movement.

The spirits from beyond this realm of consciousness are not physically bound in any way, which makes them similar to the human subconscious. Both can go places with no body attached, much like sleeping. According to Clara Burke in "The Ghosts About Us," while humans' physical bodies are at rest, their subconscious minds are free to travel about in dreams.

"Death is the twin sister of sleep," she said.

Poltergeists have long been observed and documented. The word itself, poltergeist, is an old German word meaning noisy spirit, Burke said.

All poltergeists have been identified as having a common element, the "poltergeist agent," according to "Poltergeists" by Alan Gauld and A.D. Cornell. They are centered around particular people, often adolescents and especially girls.

Since adolescence is a particularly emotional time, the spirit is able to feed off emotions ranging from repressed sexual feelings and aggression to family tension.

The poltergeist is able to focus on the individual for all activities. Outward appearances would indicate that the victim is responsible for the activity, not the poltergeist, according to Gauld and Cornell.

There are two main areas of poltergeist activities described by Gauld and Cornell, one of which is percussive sounds. The most common are rapping, tapping, thumping, thudding, crashing and banging.

Object moving is another favorite activity of a poltergeist, according to Gauld and Cornell. Tilting and lifting objects, which range from paper to very heavy items, are some favorite activities. Often these objects are hurled at specific targets.

Within the range of activity are two different kinds of poltergeists. According to Gauld and Cornell, the destructive poltergeist is the predictable but rather unpleasant type. It is responsible for more violent actions such as smashing windows, throwing stones and flinging ornaments and furniture.

The fantastical poltergeist is very complicated and often frustrating. This spirit, which has an intelligence both lunatic and disruptive, is a curious mixture of the capricious, extravagant and grotesque, according to Gauld and Cornell.

The interaction of a fantastical poltergeist intelligence with the plagued person may lead the victim to build up an entire framework of phenomena. This phenomena is accommodated to the person's beliefs, which are supported by visions or hallucinations shared with other people.

The visions can take any of six main forms, according to Gauld and Cornell. Object moving is one of these activities. Large or small, light or heavy, objects can move a little or a great distance depending on the desires of the particular poltergeist.

Another phenomenon is a type of vision in which transportation into or out of closed objects such as rooms and closets occurs.

One of the most frequently noticed activities associated with this is that of intelligence and responsiveness, which takes the form of rapping and tapping. Also, objects that have been carried away can be returned upon request.

One of the lesser documented activities is that of apparitions, which are usually visions of people and sometimes animals. Several cases have been reported where the vision was a mixture of human and animal. The visions are mainly seen by children, which ties in with the "poltergeist agent" theory.

Closely related to apparition is levitation and transportation of people. The only cases of this activity have been reports from children. When questioned, some children said they were taken under the earth to a tribe of little people. They offered the children money to stay, but none accepted.

Many people look for ways to explain their poltergeist experiences. One theory is fraud. The activity simply was not real.

By far, the most frequently accepted theory is that nervous or imaginative people tend to misinterpret or misunderstand happenings, perhaps slightly unusual, which would prove perfectly normal if anyone would bother to investigate.

This theory neither credits nor discredits the possibility of a poltergeist since few investigations are conducted. It is much easier, and sometimes safer, to attribute the action to the victim's imagination.

Fort Riley hospital undergoes change

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

The Irwin Army Community Hospital at Fort Riley is receiving a facelift.

Phases I and II of the Electrical-Mechanical Repair Project at the hospital are complete. Work on Phase III will begin as soon as furniture and equipment is moved from the clinics and wards' temporary locations back into the west wing.

"The project was divided into three phases because of funding considerations," said Capt. Sarah Baxter, repair project officer. "Because of the overall cost, we expected not to get the entire dollar amount in a single fiscal year."

Phase I called for updating the energy plant, which supports the hospital, and for provision of temporary utilities and facilities to give support during Phases II and III.

This support includes heating, plumbing, electrical wiring, ventilation and air conditioning. The energy plant is a separate building adjacent to the north side of the hospital.

"The estimated dollar cost was $26 million," Baxter said. "We ended up with two contracts to cover the three phases, and the total cost of the two was about $19 million. That would not include modifications on the plans."

Baxter said construction on the hospital began in 1955, and a major addition was built in 1975. Limited safety, seismic and architectural upgrading of the building was completed in 1982 but did not include replacement of the mechanical systems, such as heating, ventilation or air conditioning. These systems are now well beyond their life expectancy of 20-25 years, she said.

When serious inadequacies in the heating and air conditioning systems occurred in 1983, a study was performed to identify and document specific heating, ventilation and air conditioning deficiencies.

Completed in February 1984, the study concluded the mechanical systems were worn out and should be replaced. Extensive problems were also found in the electrical, plumbing and fire alarm systems. To the surprise of the hospital staff, funds were provided by the U.S. Army Forces Command in Atlanta for Phases I and II at the same time, she said.

The contract for Phases I and II, awarded in September 1985, was for $10,132,000, Baxter said. The contract for Phase III was awarded in December 1986 for $7,759,000. Work will begin immediately on Phase III and is expected to be complete in February 1990.

"Phase III consists of the same upgrading of heating, plumbing, ventilating, air conditioning, electrical and fire alarm systems in the north and south wings," Baxter said. "The south wing now houses the command and administrative functions for the hospital on the ground floor and will be closed for approximately eight months."

The north wing, mainly offices, will be closed after the work on the south wing is finished, she said. The hospital "core area" houses the main elevators. Work in this area will restrict normal traffic somewhat.

Other than unavoidable downtime while moving clinics, the effect on outpatient care is expected to be insignificant during the repairs, Baxter said.

The hospital was named after Brig. Gen. Bernard John Dowling Irwin, a recipient of the Congressional Medal of Honor who helped pioneer Fort Riley in frontier days.

Seoul frees prisoners; students plan marches

By The Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — The government released 357 political prisoners Wednesday. Many marched through the gates shouting "Down with the military dictatorship!" and demanded freedom for all their comrades.

Relatives and friends greeted them with flowers. Chants of "Long live democracy!" rose from the crowds outside prisons in Seoul and 25 other cities.

Meanwhile, radical students continued with plans for a "democratic peoples' funeral" in the capital Thursday for a student who died Sunday from injuries received in a clash with riot police a month ago.

More than 500 prisoners have been freed, including 177 released Monday. Before the releases, the government said it held 1,100 political prisoners, but the opposition contends there are hundreds more.

Justice Ministry officials said an amnesty was expected Thursday restoring the political and civil rights of about 2,100 people who have been held for anti-government offenses.

Among them is opposition leader Kim Dae-jung, who lost his rights after being convicted of sedition.

The release of prisoners and restoration of rights follow President Chun Doo-hwan's agreement July 1 to accept opposition demands for direct presidential elections and other democratic reforms.

Kim Dong-chul of the Justice Ministry told reporters more prisoners would be freed in coming months, but ministry officials said privately that scores of Communists and unrepentant prisoners would be kept in jail.

Radical students have said they would march through Seoul with the coffin of slain student Lee Han-yul, then take the body by motor convoy to Kwangju, his hometown 165 miles to the south.

Authorities said Wednesday the students would be allowed only a brief march from Yonsei University and riot police would disperse them with force if they tried to go farther.

Political leaders on both sides have appealed for calm Thursday to avert further unrest that might endanger negotiations on democratic reform.

One of the busiest and loudest workshops of Manhattan is also one of the best kept secrets of the city.

The Big Lakes Developmental Center Inc. is a sheltered workshop for mentally handicapped men and women of Riley, Geary and Pottawatomie counties.

About 175 workers are bused to the Center on Hayes Drive, a part of the Industrial Park, Monday through Friday at 8:30 a.m. and then bused home at 3:30 p.m., the end of the work day.

All of the men and women who work at the Center are on a time clock and make a living from the woodwork, paper sorting and other various jobs available to them, said Janice Pankratz, community relations coordinator for Big Lakes.

During their work day, they are allowed two short breaks and a lunch break, which are usually spent at the concession stand with a friend and a soda, she said.

The concession stand area is also a place for the developmentally disabled workers to learn new skills and prepare them for other fast-food restaurant skills such as counting change and operating the machines, Pankratz said.

"This is not a job they step right into; they are first trained in the basic training area with computers and early elementary software games that help them understand the process of change making, like how many quarters are in a dollar," she said.

The basic education area is a room also equipped for minor exercise programs available to the individual worker and has an area for group training. Pankratz said group training is given for various skills.

"One example of group training is that given to workers to learn on a new woodworking machine," she said. "They would be taught the safety and basics of, say, the jig saw."

Once this is learned, they are allowed to work in the wood shops where they make toys, picnic tables, custom-made shelves, large wooden spoons, frames and much more, Pankratz said.

Much of the woodwork is done for Manhattan area merchants, she said. McCall Pattern Co. has contracted the Center to sort outdated and overstocked patterns to then be sorted into buckets according to the paper type. Pankratz said they then eventually will use the paper as recycled paper for new patterns.

Ballard's Sporting Goods also holds a contract with the Center for frames for their silk-screening work, she said. A few other merchants included on the Center's contract list are Kansas Lumber, Kadoc, and local engineers who all receive grave stakes made in the wood shops, Pankratz said.

Not only do local businesses come to the Center for work, but many of the Center's developmentally disabled workers go out to about 15 manufacturers, businesses and individuals for work, she said.

Work done outside the Center is done by two crews: the horticulture lawn maintenance crew and the janitorial crew, Pankratz said.

Moreover, K-State has also given one of its greenhouses for the workers to use as they see fit, she said.

Pankratz said this type of horticulture therapy is not only helpful in training the workers for the horticulture lawn maintenance crew, but it is also a source of income for the Center when they sell the plants at their monthly sales.

Standards easier for Nicaraguans

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration announced Wednesday it is easing immigration standards for the 200,000 Nicaraguan exiles in the United States, including those whose asylum requests were turned down and who face deportation.

After consulting with the White House, Attorney General Edwin Meese III signed an order saying that no Nicaraguan who has a well-founded fear of persecution will be deported and that every qualified Nicaraguan seeking a work authorization will be entitled to one.

Meese directed officials of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service to "encourage and expedite Nicaraguan applications for work authorizations" and ordered INS to "encourage Nicaraguans whose claims for asylum or withholding of deportation have been denied to reapply for reopening or rehearing."

Meese declared that from now on, INS will apply the standard handed down in a March 9 Supreme Court decision that made it easier for illegal aliens to seek asylum in the United States. That standard is based on a well-founded fear of persecution, rather than the previously applied standard of clear probability of persecution.

Meese's order will mean a "much more liberal interpretation of the asylum claim," said Perry Rifkin, INS district director in Miami.

Rifkin said that under the Supreme Court decision, many Nicaraguan cases would be reopened and in those cases, "when there's a well-founded fear, we'll be able to issue work authorizations immediately."

BEIRUT, Lebanon — American hostage Jesse Turner's wife on Wednesday released a letter and a photo of the 2-week-old daughter he has never seen in hopes they will reach her husband.

Meanwhile, a previously unknown group offered to trade a videotape of a West German hostage for one of a Lebanese suspect in the June 1985 TWA hijacking who is jailed in Frankfurt. No organization has claimed responsibility for abducting the two West Germans missing in Lebanon.

Joanna is Turner's first child and the 39-year-old university teacher has never seen her.

"I had hoped you would be the first person to see my face after my birth," said the letter to "Daddy," typed in Arabic by Turner's Lebanese-born wife Badr, 37. "I hope that I will not have to wait so long to see your face and meet my father for the first time."

Turner, from Boise, Idaho, is said to speak a little Arabic but the nine-line note probably would have to be translated by his captors, if it reached them.

It was released through Beirut University College, where Turner was kidnapped Jan. 24.

Old dogs must learn new tricks

Baseball has come to symbolize the old phrase — "You can't teach an old dog new tricks."

Baseball right now is a very old dog and the way it has played for the longest time is with the white person. It started learning a new trick in 1947 when Jackie Robinson broke the color barrier along with Larry Doby later that year.

It started to learn that any person — no matter what color, religion, nationality or creed — could play the game.

That once new trick has slipped from the memory of baseball. It's time that baseball go through a refresher course on memory retention.

There are many minorities in the major and minor leagues who have been overlooked as possible managers or front-office candidates.

It's time that baseball go back to the basics, and if a young player or bench warmer has his sights set on being a front-office worker or manager, they should teach him what it takes to be one.

Georgetown University basketball coach John Thompson on Sunday's program of CBS's "Face the Nation" spoke out on the racism issue in professional sports brought about by the remarks said by Al Campanis.

Campanis, formerly the vice president of player improvement for the Los Angeles Dodgers, made his remarks on ABC's "Nightline" with Ted Koppel on April 9.

Campanis' remarks: "I'm not saying blacks aren't qualified to be managers, but that they may not have the necessities to become one."

Thompson answered, bringing out one of the many possible reasons why minorities aren't in the front offices: "Why aren't there that many minorities in the front offices?"

"Because, maybe they are focusing their sights on being something else. Maybe they don't want to be a manager, general manager or an owner."

"Maybe if they had their sights set on being one of the front-office elite, then maybe there would be some there right now."

It is this point of view, though, that seems to be the most logical so far to this writer. If a person wants to have a certain job when he is an adult, then he focuses his attention toward obtaining that job.

Maybe we should install business classes instead of setting up basketball camps for the kids to take during the summer. This would also establish education as the main thing that will get them through life instead of bouncing a ball, throwing a football or swinging a bat.

Some schools have established this kind of program with the emphasis placed on the books and not the sports.

Thompson whistled, and I hope the old dog heard him. Maybe the old dog could be learning something while teaching a young dog a new trick.

Royals lose in ninth, 9-8

By The Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Cory Snyder homered in the second inning and hit a two-run double off Dan Quisenberry with one out in the ninth to give the Cleveland Indians a 9-8 victory over the Kansas City Royals Wednesday night.

Kansas City led 8-7 entering the ninth when reliever Jerry Don Gleaton gave up an infield single to leadoff hitter Mel Hall. Gleaton then went to 2-0 on Julio Franco before Quisenberry came on to finish the walk.

Pat Tabler then sacrificed the runners to second and third, and Quisenberry intentionally walked Joe Carter to load the bases. Snyder hit his game-winning double on the first pitch up the right-center field alley, just beyond diving right fielder Danny Tartabull.

The game was delayed for 16 minutes in the bottom of the first inning when Royals starter Danny Jackson threw his first pitch behind Cleveland leadoff Brett Butler and then, after a warning to both teams, threw a pitch over Butler's head.

Butler charged the mound and both benches cleared. Jackson and Butler were ejected, and Cleveland played the game under protest because Royals Manager Billy Gardner was not ejected.

K-State rugby squad to face experienced field

By JEFF RAPP
Staff Writer

Coming off four easy victories in the Wichita RiverFest rugby tournament in Wichita two weekends ago, the K-State rugby sevens squad will face a much tougher task when they compete against some of the best rugby teams in the United States in the Tulsa Sevens tournament this Saturday in Tulsa, Okla.

tion.

Gregg Barnes, senior member of the team and one of the starting seven, said no victories will come easy for the K-State squad this weekend.

"The absolute strongest teams in the western (territory) will be there. To tell the truth, we're going to have to play extremely well just to win one game in the tournament," Barnes said.

K-State will look to surprise some teams this weekend with a young team that is inexperienced compared to much of its competition, he said.

Because this is a club tournament rather than a collegiate one, K-State was able to invite a few of its rugby alumni back to play on the squad. Among the graduates are Bill Bequette, Doug Scherich and Danny Blea, named the Most Valuable Player of the the Wichita tournament.

The squad is balanced by undergraduates Barnes, Tim Duggan, Jack Hand, Scott Teenor, Dave Todd, Kevin Wagner and Tabor Stevenson.

Barnes said the other teams in the tournament will have mostly older, more experienced teams. But no matter who K-State plays, the 'Cats will give a good battle, he said.

Because they play with only seven players rather than the usual 15 players, Barnes said it is important for the squad to have its best athletes in action.

"With seven a side only playing seven-minute halves, you want your best athletes — the fastest, the quickest, the strongest, the most fit — because it's just an all-out sprint for the whole time," Barnes said. "That's why we brought back alumni like Buck (Bill Bequette) to help us out."

K-State, though, won't be the only team fielding its best athletes.

"It will be the best athletes from the best teams in the western union, so it's going to be a killer," Barnes said.

As far as predictions for the 'Cats this weekend, Barnes said he expects nothing but rough sailing.

"We're taking three guys this weekend that have only played one season, but they're all good athletes. And we've also got a corps of some good veterans, but we could play extremely well — we could play our best rugby — and still lose every game, because the teams are so good."

"Obviously, being primarily a collegiate team, people are going to take us lightly, but people know K-State is a powerful team even though we are mostly collegiate," Barnes said.

Of the three teams with which K-State is assured competition this weekend, Barnes said the 'Cats have a good shot at beating St. Louis, Mo., and Fort Worth, Texas, but may have trouble defeating the Dallas Harlequins, who were the national sevens champions three years ago.

"It's going to be like if you took the top 16 college football teams and put them on the field," Barnes said. "Chances are, one of the top two or three teams is going to emerge, but it's an 'any-given-day' type thing. Anything can happen; anybody can beat anybody."

Stadler, Struckhoff honored

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

For the second consecutive year, two members of the K-State women's track team have been named to the GTE/COSIDA (College Sports Information Directors of America) Academic All-America first team as selected by a national panel of sports information directors.

Anne Stadler and Jacque Struckhoff have awed K-State fans the last few years with amazing times in distance running, but what may be unknown to some people is that they both carry a 4.0 grade point average.

Stadler, fifth year senior in education, hails from Prairie Village. She was recently selected as the female recipient of the 1987 Big Eight Conference Postgraduate award. Stadler was a redshirt during the outdoor season but was able to qualify for the 1987 NCAA indoor championships in the 1,000-meter run. Another of Stadler's accomplishments is that she is a three-time All-American in distance runs at K-State.

"It is really nice to get such an honor," Stadler said. She said she feels good about her accomplishments in running but feels very fortunate to have been able to do so well in the academic side of her life.

"I plan to continue my education by going on to graduate school somewhere," Stadler said. She added ed that although graduate school is in her plans, she is unsure where and when she will go.

Struckhoff, who was redshirted during the indoor season, hails from Grinnell. Struckhoff, fifth year senior in physical therapy and nutrition science, has racked up honors at K-State on the track and in the classroom.

She recently earned her fourth All-American title in track and cross country by finishing fourth in the 10,000-meter run at the NCAA meet in Baton Rouge, La. Struckhoff became the first woman to win a triple combination of distance events at the Big Eight Championships in May 1987 by winning the 3,000-, 5,000- and 10,000-meter runs.

K-State signs recruit

By The Collegian Staff

K-State baseball looks to improve on last year's performance thanks in part to the arrival of freshman sensation Brian Maize.

Maize, the 18-year-old incoming freshman first-baseman, was drafted by the Texas Rangers out of Rolling Meadows High School, Chicago, Ill., after an outstanding prep career. Head baseball coach Mike Clark said there were many pro clubs interested in Maize, and he feels fortunate Maize chose to continue his career by signing a letter of intent to play for the Wildcats.

"Brian is a real top-of-the-line ballplayer," Clark said. Maize was chosen to the All-Chicago-Land Area Team, was a unanimous all-conference selection, participated in the Illinois East-West All Star Game and was a member of the Chicago Tribune's second team All-State squad.

As a senior, Maize hit .410, including four home runs and 33 RBIs, in the same league that produced major-leaguers Greg Luzinski, Dave Kingman and Mike Marshall. Maize also holds records at Rolling Meadows High School for home runs, RBIs, doubles and sacrifice flies.

Practice 'pays off' for waterski clubs

By RHODA REIN
Collegian Reporter

Every Tuesday evening, thunderstorm warnings or not, the Flint Hills Waterski Club meets at Stockdale Cove of Tuttle Creek Lake for a few hours of fun and practice.

The Flint Hills ski club and the K-State ski team are new organizations. About 15 of the 60 Flint Hills members ski for K-State.

Practice pays off when they perform in shows and compete in tournaments.

"We are doing four ski shows this summer," said Tim Duggan, senior in marketing and K-State ski club member.

"On July Fourth we did an afternoon show in Herington and an evening show at Tuttle Puddle River Park," Duggan said. "The Manhattan show was complimentary, but we usually get paid."

Skiers performed jump acts, a triple slalom criss-cross and barefoot skiing in the shows.

Club members skied amid lightning Tuesday night to practice for the Kansas State Waterski Championships to be this weekend in Topeka. Non-collegiate members may compete in open tournaments, and club members who are full-time K-State students are eligible to compete in intercollegiate tournaments.

"If we get everybody in the club to show up and ski well, we could win it," Duggan said. "We took second place last year."

The tournament is scored on a point system, and a traveling trophy will be passed on to the new winner. "We are a young and enthusiastic club," said Kent Trenkle, senior in electrical engineering and K-State ski team member.

"Some members ski the lake as early as January," said Kent Tyrell, Flint Hills club member.

"They come out as soon as the ice gets off the lake, but I wait until the weather gets hot," Trenkle said.

Any K-State ski team member is eligible to compete at college tournaments, but points are based on the scores of five men and five women chosen to represent the team.

The K-State team will travel to the Midwest Intercollegiate Regional tournament in the fall. All collegiate regional and national competition is governed by the American Waterski Association. The top two college teams from each of the five regions qualify for the national tournament held later this year.

"Men's and women's points are combined to determine the top two regional teams," Trenkle said. "I think if K-State had a stronger women's team it would really help overall team placing."

Trenkle said most intercollegiate competitors do the three events of slalom, trick and jump.

Slalom skiers twist through six buoys within a 250-foot course, he said.

"You first pass the course at 28 mph. If you make the pass correctly, you increase speed at increments of 2 mph for each complete six-buoy pass," Trenkle said. Collegiate slalom increases to a maximum speed of 34 mph and open tournaments to 36 mph.

"Because you are traveling almost perpendicular to the boat when slaloming, you could easily be moving 50 percent faster than the boat when you cross the wake between buoys," Tyrell said.

The challenge never ends because zig-zagging through the course is more difficult after the ski rope is shortened, he said.

Competitors work to improve their weaker side during practice, Trenkle said.

"People who are right-handed have the most trouble slaloming on the right side," he said.

"Skiing is a sport where if you practice often you can get good," said Kevin Martin, junior in biology and ski team member. "I have trick skis only because I got tired of slaloming all day."

Competition trick skiers receive points based on how many tricks they do in 20 seconds, Tyrell said.

"They ski on a shorter rope to give them more wake," he said.

The boat travels between 14 and 17 mph. Martin said individuals choose the speed they feel best at since even 1 mph makes a big difference in the feel of the water.

"It is slicker than standing on ice," Martin said.

Professional skiers don't spend all their time on one slalom ski. Several different types are used.

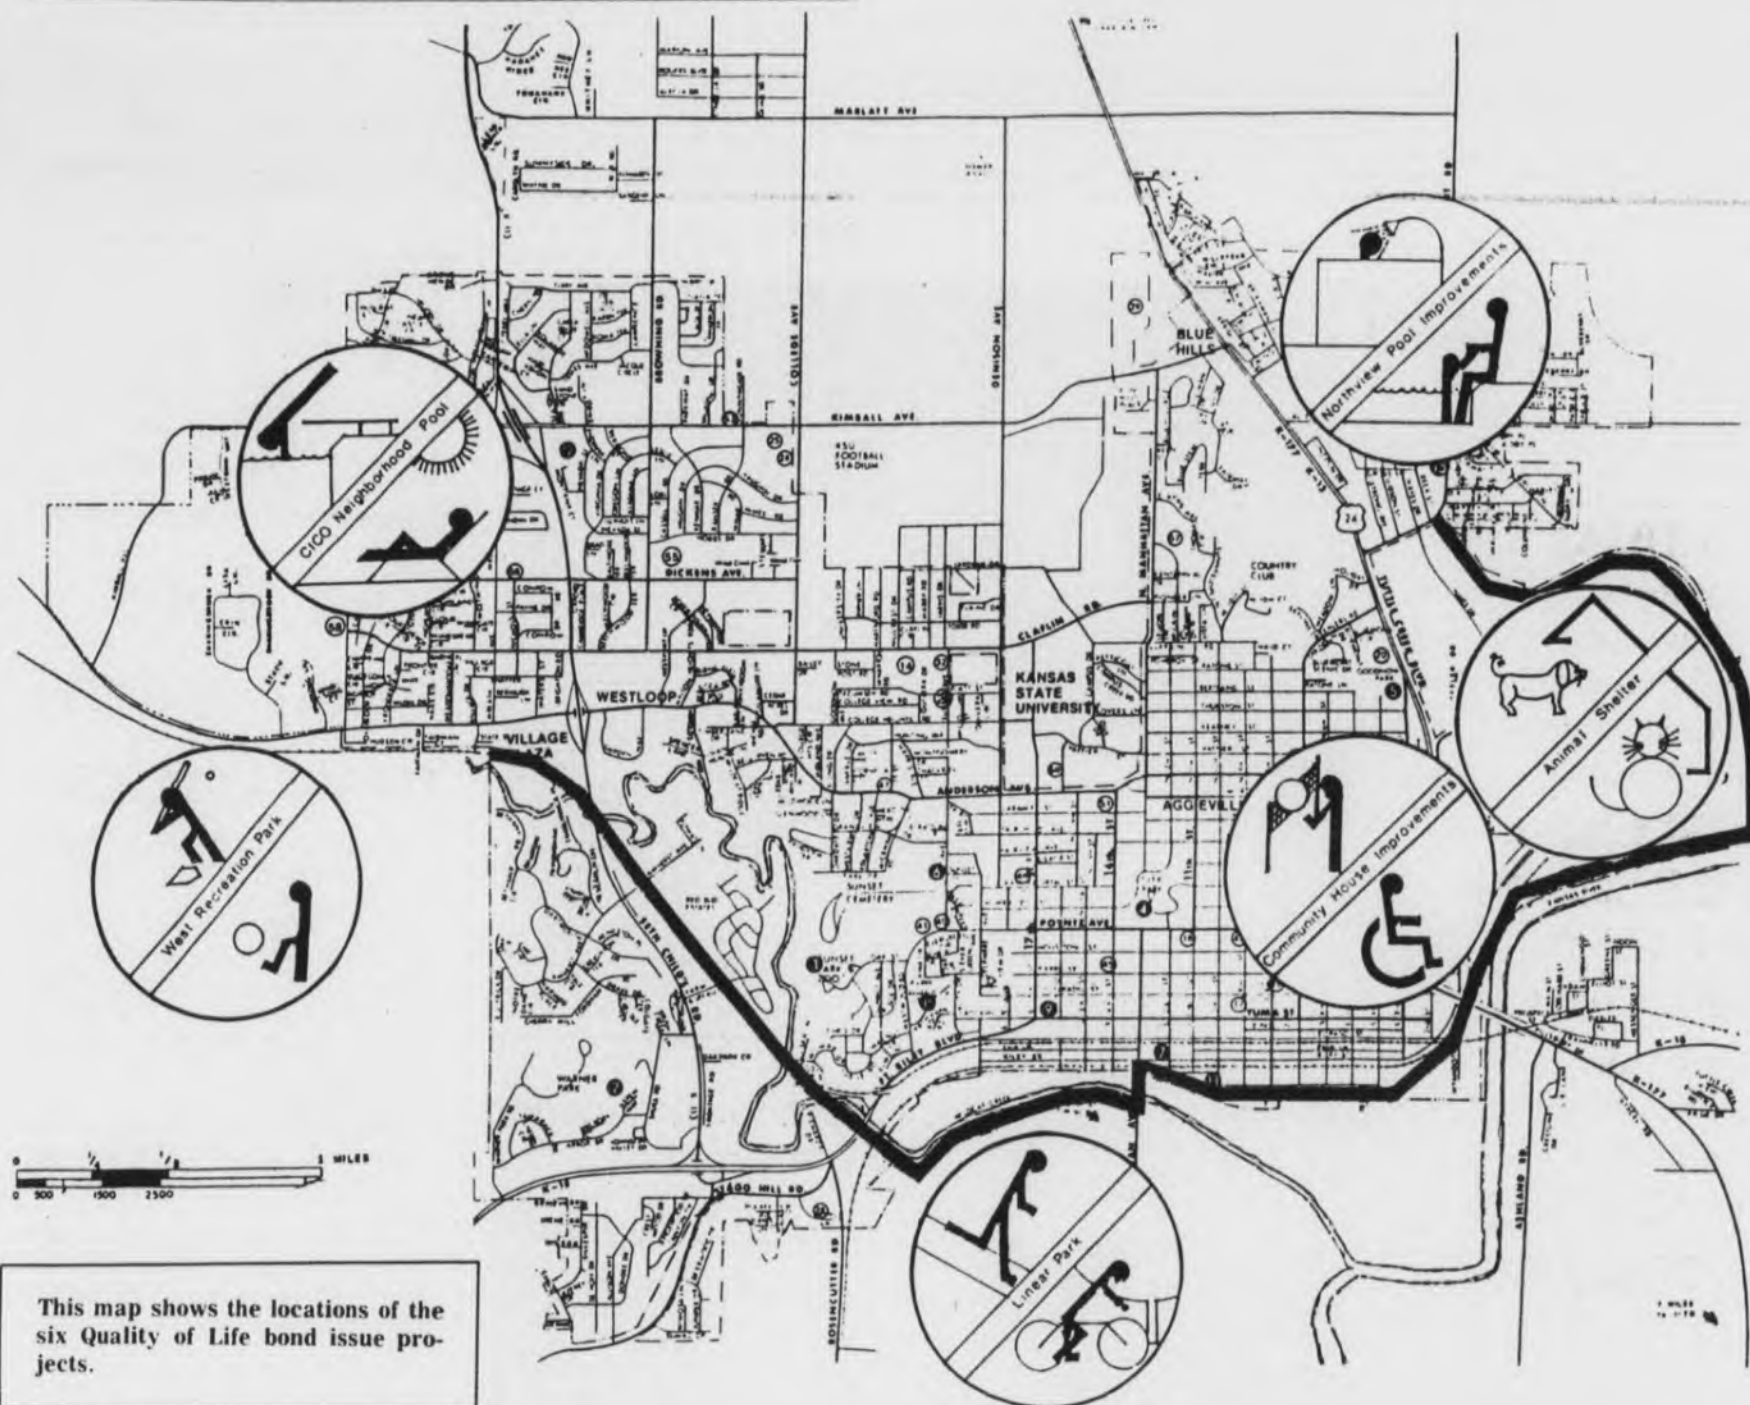

"Trick skis are hard, you have to practice a lot and not frustrate easily to get to be good."

"Taller skiers have a higher center of gravity, making it harder to trick," Tyrell said. "Little kids have a much easier time learning than adults."

However, height does not seem to matter when a person is in the air. Guts, rather than common sense, are the required ingredient to be a ski jumper, Tyrell said.

Before making a jump, Trenkle suggests these hints for proper jumping form: "knees, trees and freeze — bend your knees, look at the trees and freeze."

While Trenkle utilized the advice, the nearby lightning advised others to leave the water for safety. They crossed a lake of crashing whitecaps and loaded the boat as the first rain drops began to fall.

City to construct athletic complex

By ELTON MAYFIELD
Collegian Reporter

By spring 1988, Manhattan will have a 100-acre sport and recreation complex — room enough for softball diamonds, soccer fields and a small pond.

The $1.1 million project will be located west of Manhattan on Anderson Avenue, said Ron Fehr, assistant director of the Parks and Recreation Department.

The money is coming from three sources. The Quality of Life bond issue passed in August 1986 produced $770,000 for the project. About $250,000 will come from past revenue sharing, and the remainder will come from the park development fund. The expected completion date is spring 1988.

It will include a softball four-plex, a soccer four-plex and four other soccer fields, two of which may later be used as softball fields. A pond with picnic areas will also be built, Fehr said.

Sue Ewing, the department's program coordinator, said the need has arisen for more softball and soccer fields in Manhattan. There are 56 men's teams playing softball this year, but 21 men's teams had to be placed on a waiting list due to the lack of playing fields, she said.

The women's leagues did not fill to capacity this year, filling 21 of the 24 slots available.

"It will be interesting to see if the new complex will affect the number of women's teams that participate," Ewing said.

With the addition of four regulation-size softball fields, Manhattan will now be able to host regional, as well as state tournaments, Fehr said. Currently only one softball field is regulation size in Manhattan.

The city has soccer leagues for youth in second through eighth grades, Ewing said.

"We don't have the capacity to handle any more leagues, youth or adult," she said.

With the addition of eight new soccer fields, the city can now expand its soccer program to include high school youth and adults, Ewing said.

This year there are 288 second- and third-grade children involved in soccer. The numbers decline slightly as the youth get older, but the interest is still high, Ewing said.

Although there are not any adult soccer leagues, she said a group of adults play on Sunday evenings.

"Hopefully, with the new complex we will be able to satisfy the needs of everyone in the city, youth or adult," Ewing said.

City supports stray-cat shelter fund

By CANDY LEONARD
Staff Writer

The Manhattan City Commission voted on Tuesday to give $900 to the Riley County Humane Society "to support the Society's efforts to provide shelter for stray cats," said Mayor Gene Klingler.

Su Bacon, vice president of the Humane Society, said the Society has taken care of stray cats because the city's animal shelter is only for dogs.

"We've been taking care of stray cats for the past 12 years," Bacon said. "It costs us between $250 and $300 each month."

The new animal shelter, which is one of the six Quality of Life bond issue projects, will be operational in six months, and the Humane Society estimates spending another $1,800 on the care of stray cats during that time.

Bacon made an appeal for monetary support to cover half the amount at the commission's June 23 work session. The commissioners were in favor of the special grant.

"I think it is certainly appropriate for the city commission to cover, in part, the amount for this public service of the Humane Society," said Dick Hayter, commissioner.

Hayter said the grant, which will come out of the general fund, will acknowledge the cost absorbed by the Humane Society to control animals other than dogs.

"We first want to thank the Society for sheltering the cats, and we recognize their efforts for the new animal shelter," Hayter said.

The Humane Society recently completed a three-week fund-raising campaign for the new shelter that included direct mail solicitations as well as radio, television and newspaper advertising.

"The campaign costs us almost $1,350 in promotion, and we made our own donation of $1,500 to the shelter," Bacon said.

The shelter will be named after Russell Reitz, former mayor, who contributed $15,000 to the project.

Through their fund-raising efforts, the Humane Society was able to pass along $11,700 in contributions for the new shelter. The shelter planning committee obtained $30,000 from the Riley County Commission and $10,000 from the Pottawatomie County Commission, making it a regional animal shelter. The total budget for the new shelter now stands at $192,000.

"The budget in the Quality of Life package, approved by voters in August, was short," Bacon said. "Our concern was if the additional money wasn't raised, the capacity to house animals would be compromised."

It is estimated that the new shelter will have 2,000 square feet, twice the room of the dog shelter at the Sunset Zoo. Compared to the 14 kennels in the current shelter, the new one will have 20 permanent pens for dogs, 25 cages in the dog area and 36 cages in the cat room. Planning officials say that 81 animals can be housed at a given time.

"You need the large, permanent pens because the average dog brought to the shelter weighs 35 pounds," Bacon said.

Each of the new kennels will have its own drain, rather than using a design of one long trough, Bacon said, to control the spreading of diseases. The new shelter is scheduled for completion in February.

In the future, when the Society is relieved of the responsibility for stray cats and county dogs, Bacon said they want to concentrate their efforts toward the spay-neuter program.

been poured, and the entire project is expected to be finished by Memorial Day of 1988," Fehr said.

Renovation of the Northview Pool will begin shortly after Sept. 1.

"Plans are to complete a major renovation of the bath house similar to that of Cico, build a new 25-foot-by-50-foot training pool and a new 25-foot-by-25-foot wading pool," Fehr said.

The training pool will be 18 inches deep in the shallow end and 30 inches in the deep end.

"Due to the fact that we have a very young crowd utilizing this pool, we feel it is for their safety that this pool be built," Fehr said. "Now the beginning swimmers have somewhere else to swim other than the big pool."

"The wading pool will benefit the mothers who wish to bring their young children and not be bothered by the older crowd."

Due to overcrowding at the Northview Pool, it was necessary for these expansions, he said.

"Safety and pleasure are both in-involved in this renovation project," Fehr said. "Doubling the capacity and making it much nicer to utilize will both be big improvements for the Northview patrons."

"Admission to the City Park and Northview Pools has increased, but jobs and safety will increase next summer."

While renovation at Northview is expected to be completed by Memorial Day 1988, construction of the eight-mile trail along the outskirts of Manhattan at Linear Park is about to begin.

The trail will begin at Casement Road by the flood levy and continue along South Manhattan Avenue by Wildcat Creek to an area north of the Holiday Inn Holiday, 530 Richards Drive, where it would tie in with the Rock Island Railroad before continuing to the fire station on Anderson Avenue.

"The 8-foot-wide trail will be surfaced with fine textured limestone that compacts well for bicycle travel as well as for joggers and walkers," Fehr said.

Bids are now being discussed for Phase I of the project from Casement Road to South Manhattan Avenue, and construction is expected to begin sometime in August and be completed by Dec. 1.

"Construction on the trail will go quickly," Fehr said. "The most time will have to be spent building crosswalks under the three bridges on the Union Pacific Railroad and U.S. Highway 24."

"This project will place sidewalks and crosswalks in parts of town where there are none. We want to make this trail a safe place for our citizens to utilize."

Permits must be obtained from the U.S. Corps of Engineers, the Kansas Fish and Game Commission, the Department of Transportation and the Union Pacific Railroad in order to place a trail anywhere near the bridges. Fehr said they were working to obtain the permits and expect no delays.

Phase II of the trail project will begin when all of the land needed from South Manhattan Avenue to the fire station on Anderson Avenue has been acquired, he said.

"The Rock Island Railroad, which no longer utilizes the tracks, owns much of the land along the proposed trail," Fehr said. "As soon as we clear the property the railroad lies upon, then construction can begin."

"The master plan for the trail is that eventually it will entirely circle the city as money becomes available."

Alumni donor rate first in conference

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

K-State has the highest alumni donor rate in the Big Eight Conference and has increased its number of donors to 25,000, said Rusty Andrews, director of communications for the KSU Foundation.

Last year, the Foundation raised almost $7 million from alumni, estates, groups, organizations and corporations with $3 million coming from alumni and friends.

Andrews said K-State has the highest donor rate in the Big Eight with 25 percent of alumni contributing compared to a national average of 15 percent.

"I think a lot of the reason we have such a high donor rate is because of the aggression in our program," he said.

One program is the Annual Giving Department, which uses a constituent approach to contact potential donors. It asks alumni to give a specific dollar amount based on past donations. In the fall, mailers are sent out by each college to alumni to update what is happening in the college and how contributions can be made.

Andrews said most of the donations are designated for a specific purpose. The Foundation acts as a keeper of the money, but does not tell each college how to allocate it. However, the director there does have a responsibility to see that the donation goes where the donor specifies.

"Many Big Eight schools have similar programs, but they don't use a constituent approach. Many of them are now switching because it is more successful," Andrews said.

Candidate emphasizes public communication

By The Collegian Staff

John Holley, second contender for the position of assistant vice president for institutional advancement/University Relations, said Tuesday during an open forum that he sees the job as a new challenge, title change and career advancement.

Addressing a group of 15, Holley said he knew of several ways to stabilize K-State's declining enrollment and communicate the institution's purposes to the public.

Holley's ideas include attracting more attention to the Alfred M. Landon Lecture Series, revising admission publications and recruiting more non-traditional students.

"Top land-grant institutions must make a constant effort to educate its

"The lowest amount we can usually ask for is $35, but it varies by college. We ask recent graduates for less than those who graduated 15 to 20 years ago," Andrews said.

In the spring, 900 student volunteers participated in the telefund by contacting the alumni who received the fall mailer but did not contribute.

Each college sponsors a telefund with student volunteers calling alumni from that college. The telefund, which was started in 1979, reaches more than 60,000 alumni and takes a total of 40 sessions to complete, he said.

"The telefund is extremely helpful," Andrews said.

The volunteers are chosen by faculty who pick two students from each college. They, in turn, choose two more students to be "team captains" who recruit the rest of the volunteers, he said.

All donations are used for purposes within the alumni's college unless otherwise designated to go to scholarships or other special funds, he said.

"A very small number of the people called resent being asked for a donation. There will always be someone who won't want to be asked," Andrews said.

"But, a lot of them realize it takes more than state appropriations to make K-State better. They are usually glad to help because they realize you can get a quality education at K-State and it costs a lot more to get the same education somewhere else," he said.

In May, another mailer is sent out including an Achievement Report and an Honor Roll that lists all the donors.

publics," he said. Holley said his public relations experience was his strongest qualification for the position.

Moreover, he said his interest in people and his ability to communicate qualify him for the position.

Holley is currently director of university and corporate relations and instructor of journalism at Lincoln University of Missouri, Jefferson City. He has previously held public relations positions at Albany (Ga.) State College, Mansfield (Pa.) State College, and Morgan State University in Baltimore.

The third candidate, Fred W. Hensley, withdrew his application. John T. Fairman, the final candidate, will speak in an open forum at 1:30 today in Union 212.

North

benefits brought a pained expression to North's face. Nields explained his reference was to a $13,900 home security system installed in North's home, the subject of lengthy testimony earlier in the day.

North testified that he made "the grossest misjudgment" of his life in creating phony letters to conceal that he hadn't paid for the system but said his family had to have it because of death threats from Abu Nidal, whom North said was the world's best-known terrorist.

"That was the first time in my life that I accepted something that I hadn't paid for," said the Marine officer. After threats from terrorist Abu Nidal, he said, he accepted the $13,900 security system, which other testimony has shown was paid for by his main Iran-Contra operative, retired Maj. Gen. Richard V. Secord.

"This lieutenant colonel was not offered at that time any protection by the government of the United States," North said. He said he was told all that could be done for him was a transfer to Camp LeJeune, N.C.

Looking straight at the array of senators and congressmen in front of him, North urged them to change the law to make such protection possible for others in his situation.

North said that before he undertook a risky mission to Tehran, then-CIA Director William J. Casey suggested he might face torture if captured and should be prepared to take his own life.

In other developments during North's second day as the star witness before joint House and Senate committees investigating the Iran-Contra affair:

—Committee investigators began private questioning of Attorney General Edwin Meese III at the Justice Department, according to sources there. Meese was expected to be asked about his weekend inquiry last November which led to disclosure of the diversion of proceeds to the Nicaraguan Contras.

—When North was asked who besides himself in the government knew in advance about the diversion, North named Rear Adm. John Poindexter, the former national security adviser; Robert McFarlane, Poindexter's predecessor, and Casey. He said Casey was very enthusiastic about the project and that he and the CIA director talked at length about using the money for covert activities "beyond the Nicaraguan assistance."

—North denied that President Reagan told him last Nov. 25, the day the diversion was publicly disclosed, that it was "important that I not know" about the diversion — meaning that Reagan not be seen as having known earlier. Nields asked North if he hadn't told former White House colleague Lt. Col. Robert Earl that Reagan had said that, but North said, "I don't recall the conversation that way."

Tuition

tional sections, but there was no money available to do this, Linddall said.

"You can't spend money that isn't there," he said. Beginning with the fall semester of 1986, KU began using money earmarked for the following semester, a practice which was continued until May 1987. At that time, the Legislature, at the recommendation of Gov. Mike Hayden, returned a portion of the fee money, which is collected each semester.

To provide the necessary resources for all the KU students, $1.2 million was needed. The refund was $960,000, roughly three-fourths of what was needed, Linddall said.

Some departments are making changes to combat the lack of funds. The College of Arts and Sciences will no longer be offering remedial math and English classes.

Artist

saleable to clients. Bookwalter said his style is a combination of contemporary collage and painting. Designing posters and painting aircraft for corporations such as Rockwell International, 3M Co. and Honeywell are his specialty.

"I originally took flying lessons," Bookwalter said. "It was either be a fighter pilot or an illustrator. I decided to stay on the ground."

Companies dealing with aircraft want the artwork to be exact. For example, the preliminary sketches for Rockwell have to go to the Pentagon for approval before he paints them.

Bookwalter understands the process because he worked as an art director for six years.

"Art directors team up with a writer to decide the direction and concept of the campaign," Bookwalter said. "They draw stick people and then hire someone like me to make them look real."

During those years as an art director, Bookwalter said he spent too much time on his color compositions. Someone suggested he become an illustrator instead.

"Now I'm letting art directors tell me what to do," he said. "They will give me a layout to follow that the client has already seen and approved."

In Bookwalter's opinion, female art directors are easier to work for and know how to get the best work from a person.

"Women trust you to do what is your best for the client," Bookwalter said. "Male art directors are either too afraid they will lose their job or they are frustrated because they aren't an illustrator themselves."

Being able to draw, paint and communicate with people are the important credentials for the illustration business, Bookwalter said. He graduated from Kansas State Teachers College at Emporia in 1966. Later, at the age of 28, he attended Art Center College of Design in Los Angeles.

One of his instructors was Jack Leynwood, the illustrator who for many years has painted the pictures found on the box tops of Revell model airplanes.

"He was the most competent man I have ever seen as far as painting in color," Bookwalter said. "He was very versatile."

It has taken several years of staying versatile and working hard for Bookwalter to free-lance. The industry is very competitive and is not as easy as it looks, he said.

"You do the best you can do with the time and the budget you're allowed," Bookwalter said. "You can't make the Sistine Chapel out of a $500 newspaper ad."

Bookwalter said persistence is the key to success as an illustrator. Now, he notices that he can work through a job more quickly by relying on his training and instincts.

"The secret for me now is staying fresh," he said. "If I can put a new twist to what I'm doing — something that is vogue — it becomes a saleable product."

Bookwalter said that besides having a new approach, working as a free-lancer requires business savvy. He sometimes has six or eight jobs at once, but they are at different stages.

"I try to keep my business simple and not let it become too complicated," he said.

Bookwalter's goals for the future include maintaining his national clients because "that is the most fun for me."

Committee orders North to continue

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After a day of praise and tongue-lashing Monday, Lt. Col. Oliver North was ordered back for a sixth day of testimony before the congressional Iran-Contra committees, to be followed by a rebuttal appearance by his former boss, Robert McFarlane.

McFarlane, President Reagan's former national security adviser, intends to challenge statements made by North in at least three areas where the former White House aide said he had authority from superiors, said Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., chairman of the House Iran-Contra committee.

He said those areas were: alteration of documents, the Contra resupply program and solicitation of foreign countries for aid for the Nicaraguan rebels.

"In all three instances, it's a question of authority," Hamilton said. "I think there is a flat contradiction as to those points. He is coming in because he wants to directly dispute and contradict the testimony of Colonel North on those several items."

North spent most of Monday listening to praise and occasional condemnation for his actions, with one committee member declaring "there's going to be one lot of hell raised" if North is prosecuted but another worrying about adopting values "of a totalitarian government."

North's worst tongue-lashing came from Rep. Jack Brooks, D-Texas, who recited a litany of activities mentioned in North's testimony the past five days and said: "Democracy cannot survive that kind of abuse."

"I do not believe in adopting...the philosophies and values of a totalitarian society," said North. "I honestly believed we carried out those activities within the constraints of law."

The activities, as he had outlined them last week, were putting profits from secret arms sales to Iran to use for arming the Nicaraguan rebels and for other secret projects.

Brooks tried to question North about what the congressman called "a plan to suspend the Constitution" but was stopped by Sen. Daniel Inouye, chairman of the Senate committee.

North appeared to balk at answering and Inouye issued his ruling, saying "I believe that question touches on a highly sensitive and classified area so may I request that you not touch upon that, sir."

Brooks protested that the plan had been mentioned in the Miami Herald and other newspapers. The Herald said in a front-page story on July 5 that North "helped draw up a controversial plan to suspend the Constitution in the event of a national crisis, such as nuclear war, violent and widespread internal dissent or national opposition to a U.S. military invasion abroad."

According to the Herald, then-Attorney General William French Smith protested at the time in writing to McFarlane.

Inouye said that McFarlane would follow North "as a matter of fairness."

There will be one other witness on Tuesday, a White House custodian of documents, before Rear Adm. John Poindexter — who succeeded McFarlane as national security adviser — will appear.

Brooks told North:

"Instead of operating within rules and law, we have been supplying lethal weapons to terrorist nations, trading arms for hostages, involving the U.S. government in military activities in direct contravention of the law, diverting public funds into private pockets and secret unofficial activities, selling access to the president for thousands of dollars, dispensing cash and foreign money orders out of a White House safe, accepting gifts and falsifying documents to cover it up, altering and shredding national security documents, lying to the Congress."

That finished, Brooks said: "I believe that the American people understand that democracy cannot survive that kind of abuse."

As the hearings entered their ninth week on Capitol Hill, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater maintains that Reagan never was briefed on the possible diversion of arms sales profits for the Contras or any other covert operation.

Fitzwater's statement was in response to an assertion Sunday by Inouye that Poindexter in 1986 had initialed a memo indicating he had briefed Reagan about such use.

Reagan's spokesman said that Inouye's characterization was inaccurate and that Poindexter will back that up. Later he said, "We have no way of knowing what he is going to say."

Inouye also was challenged by two Republican committee members about his statement, which he made on a television talk show.

He replied that he did not say Reagan had been briefed on the use of the profits, only that the committees had found a memo apparently bearing Poindexter's initial and the word "Done," indicating the adviser had conducted such a briefing.

K.S. Viswambhara, director of graphics at the Goa College of Art in Panjim, India, stands in front of the printing presses in the Art Building. He is teaching a two-week workshop in the materials, tools and process of intaglio printing, which is used to print dollar bills.

Indian artist expresses old technique

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

During the early 15th century, while Johann Gutenberg was inventing movable type in Germany to print books, artists were developing a technique to create images called intaglio printing.

As all art forms do, intaglio spread throughout the world, attracting artists in many countries. It reached India in the early part of century and today, one of India's foremost intaglio artists is visiting K-State.

K.S. Viswambhara, director of graphics at the Goa College of Art in Panjim, India, is teaching a two-week workshop in the materials, tools and process of intaglio printing, a process now used to print dollar bills.

Viswambhara said he has always had an interest in art.

"Printmaking is a medium I have found suitable for my expression," he said. "The printing medium is in my blood."

Viswambhara has spent 12 years concentrating on intaglio printmaking. The process involves cutting grooves into a block of metal or wood, filling the grooves with ink and transferring the ink onto paper.

The most important part of the technique is creating the texture of the image, he said, and he tries to explore expression through the lines and the three-dimensional image they project from the paper.

Viswambhara said his father owned a printing press and printed books — a different discipline of the printing process than intaglio.

Viswambhara's interest in printing developed while he attended school at Shantiniketan, near Calcutta in West Bengal. His work is influenced by the folklore of his country.

"India is full of folk art, both visual and performing," he said.

Much of his work deals with a family experience and psychological male/female relationships displayed in a folk manner, Viswambhara said.

Charles Stroh, professor and head of the Department of Art, said he met Viswambhara in India in the spring of 1985. The idea for Viswambhara to come to K-State has taken two years to materialize.

The art department tries to find visiting artists to teach workshops each summer. Stroh said Viswambhara's visit is especially exciting.

"It's a golden opportunity. We have so little contact with people from other cultures," he said.

Coliseum news good, bad

Worker falls, suffers injuries

By The Collegian Staff

A construction worker is in stable condition at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan., after falling 60 feet at the site of the partially-erected Fred Bramlage Coliseum last week.

Hilario Martinez of Foster Erection Co., Wichita, stepped on an unsecured girder Wednesday morning and fell 55 to 60 feet, landing on a steel and mud slope, said Richard Herrman, investigator with the K-State Police.

He was taken to The Saint Mary Hospital by a Riley County ambulance and was transported to Kansas City, Kan., about noon Wednesday.

Brad Olney, orthopedic surgeon at the medical center, said Martinez suffered a lower back fracture, open fracture in the left shin, open dislocation in the left foot, open dislocation-fracture in the right ankle and a laceration over the right knee.

Bramlage director to offer variety of entertainment

By The Collegian Staff

Charles E. Thomas Jr., first director of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, plans to bring activities to the coliseum which will not only interest K-State students but audiences from the community, as well.

"I'm going to try to bring a balance of entertainment into the community," said Thomas, who was hired last week after Michael R. Barber, who had originally accepted the position, declined the offer.

As far as concerts and family entertainment, Thomas said he needs to study what activities have been done in the past on campus so he can determine what has been successful and what has not.

"I think family shows like Sesame Street, the Globetrotters and the circus would be do well here," Thomas said. "The coliseum is going to be a multipurpose center."

Thomas said he would like to bring some trade shows into the area, as well. It is necessary to show people a program can bring in a large crowd to events, he said.

Concerning area competition, Thomas said Kansas City is three hours away, so he does not think it will offer much competition to the coliseum.

"I don't see any reason why the Bramlage (Coliseum) can't compete with Topeka and the surrounding area," Thomas said.

Thomas expects to be in Manhattan by July 29 to settle in, but his first week as the new director will be spent in Washington, D.C., at the International Association of Auditorium and Arena Managers opening the "lines of communication," he said.

Thomas has been the associate director of The Sun Dome at the University of South Florida, Tampa, since 1982. Although he has a journalism degree, Thomas said he has always been interested in the work of coliseum directors.

Lawyer claims Manila government asked him to find Marcos' money

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A lawyer who tricked former Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos into disclosing a plot to invade his homeland said Monday the Manila government promised him a $700 million reward for information leading to the recovery of gold bullion hidden by the exiled leader.

Richard Hirschfeld said he had signed a contract June 4 with the Philippine government, which promised him 5 percent of the estimated $14 billion in gold bullion Marcos may have concealed in the Philippines.

Hirschfeld and his associate Robert Chastain, both of Virginia Beach, Va., last week played tapes before a congressional panel of conversations they had with Marcos at his home in Hawaii. In the tapes, the former president said he wanted weapons to fight against the new Philippine government headed by Corason Aquino.

In the recordings, made through a hidden microphone, Marcos also told Hirschfeld he owned 1,000 tons of gold worth $14 billion, possibly hidden in the Philippines, as well as $500 million deposited in Switzerland.

Hirschfeld said in an interview that he had given copies of the tapes to the Manila government as well as the FBI immediately after they were made last May 21.

The original recordings are in a "safe place" in Geneva, Switzerland, Hirschfeld said, and contain "inflammatory remarks" Marcos made about U.S. public figures. He declined to specify and said the tapes played before the committee had been edited to delete those remarks.

Hirschfeld said that in the contract, the Philippine government promised "to gratefully pay to a corporation or friend designated by you, either in Swiss francs or in kind, 5 percent of the value of gold or other precious metals within 90 days after recovery."

The document further states that the Philippine government "wants to extend its deepest and most profound appreciation for your will to go out of your way to assist the people of the Philippines in their quest for justice."

The contract was signed by Ramon A. Diaz, chairman of the Presidential Commission of Good Government, Hirschfeld said.

A spokesman at the Philippine embassy said he did not have any immediate comment on Hirschfeld's claim. However, he confirmed that the Presidential Commission of Good Government had been set up to "recover the hidden wealth of Marcos and his cronies."

The spokesman, Ramon Senefres, said the commission had an office at the embassy in Washington, but its director was in Manila for consultations.

A spokesman for Marcos denied the voice on the tapes was that of the exiled leader, who was invited by President Reagan to live in the United States in 1986.

But an aide to Rep. Stephen Solarz, D-N.Y., chairman of the panel which disclosed the tapes, said that although committee members were unsure of the motives behind Hirschfeld and Chastain's "bizarre" actions, the tapes were genuine.

Patrick Korten, a Justice Department spokesman, said the tape recording is of "very limited use" in terms of being used in some possible future Justice Department action involving Marcos. He declined to elaborate.

Korean president replaces officials

SEOUL, South Korea — President Chun Doo-hwan replaced his prime minister and seven other Cabinet members Monday with officials he said would be neutral in coming presidential elections. Foes scorned the change as cosmetic.

"No fresh and new people are included in the shakeup. All are worn-out people," the main opposition Reunification Democratic Party said in a statement.

"We suspect that these people would not carry out democratic reforms without any hitch," it said. "It is seriously doubtful that the new Cabinet would manage elections in a fair and just manner."

Earlier Monday, opposition party president Kim Young-sam demanded that the government release all political prisoners by Friday, including those accused of being communists. It was his strongest verbal challenge to Chun.

Chun agreed this month after weeks of violent anti-government demonstrations to hold direct popular elections this fall to select his successor. His seven-year term expires in February.

Deaver attorneys pursue injunction

WASHINGTON — Jury selection began Monday in the perjury trial of Michael K. Deaver, President Reagan's former aide and longtime confidant, while defense lawyers fought to keep the panel from hearing a prosecution claim that he may have committed numerous other violations of ethics laws.

In a brief filed with U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson, Deaver's defense team argued that independent counsel Whitney North Seymour has wrongfully sought "carte blanche to drag any and all allegations of violations of the Ethics in Government Act in front of the jury."

A five-count indictment, returned March 18, accused Deaver of lying to Congress and a grand jury about whether he traded upon his White House connections to build a multimillion-dollar lobbying business, which has since turned to shambles. Deaver resigned as Reagan's deputy chief of staff in 1985.

Deaver, who entered and left the courtroom without comment Monday, has said previously he is confident he will be acquitted of the perjury charges because "I had no reason to lie because I had done nothing wrong."

Slumlord staying in his tenements

LOS ANGELES — A slumlord began serving a 30-day sentence in one of his own buildings Monday, confined amid the rat droppings, cockroaches, broken glass and falling plaster of a tenement he has repeatedly refused to repair.

Dr. Milton Avol, wearing an electronic monitor so that authorities know that he stays put, moved into an apartment with fresh paint and new locks on the doors.

"It's clean; it's better than the other apartments we saw the last time we were here," city building inspector Tom Pope said of Avol's apartment. "I don't know how the doctor lives now, but I imagine it will be quite a difference in lifestyle."

State official free from prosecution

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Monday he plans to take no legal action against State Treasurer Joan Finney in connection with a complaint that her 1986 re-election campaign misused taxpayer money.

Stephan said he has decided that the Democratic state treasurer's reimbursement of funds to the state last week satisfied the goals of the commission and made further legal action unnecessary.

Finney wrote a personal check to the state general fund Friday for $2,004.31 to cover all possible costs which might have been viewed as questionable by the Kansas Public Disclosure Commission.

The repayment came a day after the commission decided that her campaign violated state law by failing to file an amended campaign finance report showing how her campaign received and spent an "in kind" contribution of about $1,600 in state funds.

"Mrs. Finney, by reason of her reimbursement, has complied with the principal legal requirement demanded by the commission," said Stephan, a Republican.

"Reimbursing the state may not bring Mrs. Finney's campaign into full, technical compliance with the reporting statutes, but it does resolve the matter in principle," he said.

Finney told a news conference the repayment was not an admission of guilt and she planned to appeal the commission's decision.

County survives influx of refugees

WASHINGTON — Garden City, Kan., and Finney County have absorbed an influx of Southeast Asian refugees without any major discrimination problems, according to a report approved Monday by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

The report, prepared by the commission's Kansas Advisory Committee, said there were "some complaints" but "no major examples of discrimination in the areas of employment, housing, public accommodation or the administration of justice" were found by the committee in its review of the southwestern Kansas community.

The advisory committee, which is made up of Kansans who serve without compensation, prepared the report based on a March 1986 forum in Garden City to examine the status of civil rights issues in the area.

The report noted that there were relatively large Southeast Asian and Hispanic communities in the Garden City area, with refugees from Southeast Asia having settled in the area to work in meat packing plants.

Language barriers were cited in the report as problems encountered by law enforcement authorities and businesses, but it noted that efforts were being made to find adequate interpreters.

In addition, the report generally applauded the Garden City school district's bilingual education program for Hispanics and an "English as a second language" program for Asian students.

The report said advisory committee members had received allegations of credit discrimination, generally that women found it harder to obtain credit than men, but "it was difficult to determine the extent of the problem."

Angry customer pulls co-op's plug

MULVANE — A man upset with the Sumner-Cowley Electric Cooperative shot power line insulators with a handgun Monday, pulling the plug on about 300 homes, a co-op spokesman said.

Mark Brown, general manager of the Wellington-based co-op, said three housing additions in a rural area just west of Mulvane along the Sedgwick-Sumner county line were without electricity for about two hours starting around 11:45 a.m.

Brown said a man who had a longstanding billing dispute with the co-op asked Monday that some lines in his yard be moved. Brown told the man he couldn't get a crew out today.

When linemen showed up to search for the source of the outage, the man allegedly told them, "I knew that would get you out here," Brown said.

Sumner County sheriff's deputies took the man into custody for questioning and six co-op workers restored service, Brown said. He didn't have a damage estimate, but said the biggest part of the cost would be the two hours of labor involved in making repairs.

Martin takes post as McCain director

By The Collegian Staff

Richard Martin has been chosen as the new director of McCain Auditorium, replacing Steven Riggs who was the interim director for about a year.

Martin will be in charge of scheduling and coordinating at the auditorium and becomes the head of the Performance Arts Series.

Martin worked at The Pennsylvania State University where he was manager of the Artists Series in the Center for Performing Arts from 1979 until May. He was also resident director of the Cooperative Russian Language Program at Leningrad State University in the Soviet Union from 1972 to 1974.

"I was familiar with K-State's program, but I haven't been here long enough to know all I need to know," Martin said.

"K-State has a very good program. It has very good support from the University and the community. We have a good faculty and good facilities that can accommodate practically anything you want to present."

The main reason he took the position was because it was a personal challenge and he was ready for a change, Martin said.

Some of the attractions in the Performing Arts Series for the 1987-88 school-year include Roger Miller and Thomas Chapin performing compositions ranging from country and pop to Broadway show tunes. A Christmas show in December will feature a Canadian brass ensemble.

"My goals are to make certain that we have the best possible services in McCain with high quality and professional standards," he said.

College of Education stresses quality

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

Sharpening the focus and enhancing the quality rather than the quantity of instruction, research, development and service will be emphasized in the College of Education's strategic plan, said David Byrne, dean of the college.

"I don't think this type of strategic planning is allowing for any new programs. It's not a quantitative growth model, but a qualitative model," he said.

But the college does plan to retain its dominance as the leader of education and will attempt to improve its reputation for quality, Byrne said.

"Any institution needs a sense of direction, and one major purpose of strategic planning is to establish that direction and move the institution along that path," he said.

The college will have to get "meaner and leaner" because of budget restraints, and some areas will have to be taken away for the sake of others, Byrne said.

Two programs to be eliminated are an educational psychology

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

degree and an occupational emphasis with a degree.

In conjunction with these cuts, Byrne said the college will be asking for a $1 million increase in its base budget in the next five years to catch up with its peer institutions.

"My college is extremely underfunded to what it does now. We're only at 77 percent of our funding compared to peer institutions," he said. "The most recent analyses showed we are nearly $1 million underfunded, and the more the college's enrollment grows, the further behind it falls."

Byrne said the college was asking for resources to underwrite new faculty, but whether or not it receives the funds depends on how much money the University receives.

"We're having difficulty recruiting and keeping faculty because (of) the low K-State salary. The many that are staying are making below what they ought to be," he said.

The college anticipates escalating costs in the future, Byrne said. Because the population of school children in Kansas is projected to grow by 20,000 by 1992, the college expects substantial enrollment increases. Traditionally, to compensate for this increase, it would request more funding based on the amount of people it is training, he said.

Instead, the college will use sound management practices, aggressive pursuit of extramural support and internal reallocation to produce a quality education training, research, development and service program for Kansas, Byrne said.

Moving teacher education to a five-year program is also an issue, he said, but currently this is not seen as an attractive move because of faculty and budget constraints. Byrne said the strategic plan itself probably will not affect students in the college.

"Strategic planning is more of a resource document than a programmatic document," he said. "There are a lot of things going on that affect students, so you can't pinpoint it to just one plan."

Because of the nature of the college's priorities and the demands put upon the departments, smaller and more clearly focused administrative units will be established to better address its responsibilities to students and faculty, he said.

In the past, the departments within the college have been so large and diverse, they have required what has become a full-time manager, Byrne said.

The college would like to redefine the role to de-emphasize management, to encourage instructional leadership by the chair of the department and to stimulate intellectual partnership by its faculty, he said.

Kansas community to build economy

By The Associated Press

OBERLIN — In his dream of economic salvation for this small community, Don Fredrickson envisions people boarding minibuses and being shuttled around major metropolitan airports across America.

The buses would be stamped "Made in Oberlin, Kan."

A lot of other folks around this community, located just miles from the Nebraska border in northwest Kansas, share Fredrickson's vision.

For the past 18 months, Fredrickson, 60, has helped lead a drive to establish Kansas Coach Manufacturing Co., a company that will manufacture minibuses. It is an effort to pump new life into a decaying economic base that has long depended on oil and agriculture.

"One thing we all know is we need to do something to provide jobs for our young people and to keep people here," said the retired grocer.

Last month, Kansas Coach started production with six full-time employees in a 22,000-square-foot factory on the east edge of town.

If the business plan works, Kansas Coach minibuses will be purchased by car rental companies for shuttling passengers from airport terminals, small school districts and retirement communities, and will generate more than $3 million in annual revenues and provide as many as 100 jobs.

Earlier this year, the people of Oberlin formed a public corporation, issued a stock offering and raised $325,000 to provide seed capital for Kansas Coach. Investing a minimum of $500, about 230 people in this community of about 2,200 purchased shares with the usual risks of a fledgling venture.

"I was talking to one businessman in town about the deal. He said, 'We can try this and it may work and it may not work, but if we sit on our fannies and do nothing, we'll dry up and blow away for damned sure,'" said Fredrickson.

Residents have combined their investment with a $400,000 development grant from the state, a $400,000 line of credit from Farmers National Bank in Oberlin and a $500,000 loan from the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System to start Kansas Coach.

Jack Metcalf, 52, a real estate broker and businessman, is the chairman of Kansas Coach and has been involved since March in the effort to bring the business to town.

"There have been a few problems getting this thing started...but I really believe that we have a business that will survive — unless we mismanage the hell out of it," Metcalf said.

Outwardly, things appear well in the Decatur County seat. Shoppers still stroll along the covered sidewalks of Oberlin's picturesque main street, Penn Avenue.

Business, though, has been slipping.

When city administrator Bob Finkbinder moved to Oberlin from Wichita just over two years ago, the town's decline was in full swing. In two years on the job, he has watched his city's population, work force and economic base erode.

"Everything is down, and we are trying our best to do something to diversify our economic base and not be so dependent on one or two industries," he said.

Since 1983, Oberlin's fortunes have reflected those of agriculture and oil. Sales tax collections, an indicator of activity among the town's retail businesses, have fallen from a high of $708,759 in 1983 to $528,405 in 1986.

There have been layoffs among major employers, and the number of people working has dropped by 150 since 1983 — a large percentage for an economy with only 2,000 jobs.

Experts assemble in Union

By The Collegian Staff

Members of the Western Agricultural Economics Association have gathered in Manhattan to present and discuss papers and research during their annual conference.

Jeff Williams, associate professor of agricultural economics and chairman of the conference, said the purpose of the conference is not extension or public-information oriented but rather a time for professors and researchers to collaborate.

"We want to improve upon our past research and find new directions," Williams said.

The three-day conference in the K-State Union has brought nearly 150 agricultural economics professors and researchers from Midwest and Western universities and the U.S. Department of Agriculture to the campus.

Topics of presentation include resource economics, production economics, finance, quantitative methods, financial issues affecting borrowers and lenders, marketing and price response, trade and policy, risk in agricultural decisions and agriculture and the community.

Cloggers entertain folk music fans during 'old-time' country hoedown

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

Somewhere in northeast Kansas lies Hardway County, gateway to the Kansas Mountain Range, site of Dr. Hiram P. Possumfat's Kansas Mountain Mineral Water Co. and home for the Scrapwood String Band and Cloggers.

Thursday evening, the Scrapwood String Band and Cloggers ventured out in their Japanese pickup from the fictitious Hardway County to Manhattan. About 1,200 city folk gathered at the park to hear some old-time country music and see some traditional clogging.

The 11-member ensemble plays old-time country music, a precursor to bluegrass. Malcolm Smith, mandolin player and chief storyteller for the group, said old-time country music originated in the Appalachian Mountains in the areas of northern Georgia and South Carolina. The music is an American tradition with an Irish influence, he said.

The Irish also had a foot in another American tradition the group displays — clogging.

This fast-stepping, heel-clicking dance is the result of a melting pot of ethnic dances. Clogging, which comes from the same region in the Appalachians, was influenced by the Irish jig, the trapper's "buck and wing" and Cherokee Indian dances, Smith said.

The Scrapwood String Band and Cloggers is also a kind of a melting pot. Professions of the members range from social work to teaching to geology.

"It's a social thing that's become a real solid hobby for us," Smith said.

This is the band's fourth year together.

Their repertoire ranges from Hardway County hoedown fiddle tunes to haunting Irish melodies. Their instruments include guitars, washboard/woodblock, fiddle, bass, harmonica, dulcimer, banjo, jew's harp and penny whistle.

The band learns the music and the dance in the traditional way — they find people who know it and learn from them, Smith said.

The search for old-time musicians leads the group away from Hardway County into southern Missouri and northern Arkansas.

The search for old-time country music takes them into music history files. They try to follow the styles and songs of groups such as Gid Tanner and the Skilletlickers or Charlie Poole and the North Carolina Ramblers, Smith said.

"The people who wrote this music were hard workers who played hard," he said. "We feel a kindred spirit the people felt a hundred years ago when we play."

However, the thrill for the group is in performing.

"The real joy of sharing the music is that it is enjoyable for the audience," Smith said. "The older people remember this music, and the younger people love it because it deals with a simpler time."

Much of the music is spirited and humorous, closely abiding by the Hardway County motto: "If pigs run free, why not we?"

When the band is performing songs like "Granny's in Bed With Her Boots On," "There Ain't No Bugs On Me," the Hardway County theme song "Have a Drink On Me" and "Up

She Rises/Cluck Old Hen," the cloggers get a chance to kick up their heels and show off.

Dressed in a prairie skirt and blouse, black tights and Mary Poppins shoes, each clogger displays her uniquely different style.

Sometimes it looks like they're swing dancing and sometimes it looks like they're square dancing, but it always looks like they're having fun.

The audience has fun, too, whether they clap along or laugh as Smith tells the exploits of their fictitious sponsor, Dr. Hiram P. Possumfat.

As the story goes, Possumfat was on an herbal mission in northeast Kansas when he noticed a granite pathway up a cliff. The doctor climbed the path to the top of the cliff where he saw the Flint Hills on his left and the Kansas Mountain Range on his right.

Possumfat then stumbled upon a mountain mineral water spring, from which he developed "one of the greatest scientific cures of all time," Smith said.

"Dr. Possumfat was 'not just your ordinary quack' but a certified archaeologist, sociologist, proctologist and gynecologist," he said.

His elixir, Dr. Hiram P. Possumfat's Kansas Mountain Mineral Water, cures the gout, Aunt Martha's protruding kidneys or any other problem Hardway County residents might have, Smith said.

The potion will cure any discomforting ailments cowboys might suffer, he said. A mere 22 bottles will allow the horseman to "ride high in the saddle again."

It also can improve "certain aspects of normal married life," Smith said.

Taxing of illegal drugs hypocritical ordinance

Recently, the state Legislature enacted a law which requires all sellers and holders of illegal substances to pay a tax for possessing these goods. The drug tax has a base price and then is incremented on a price per ounce basis.

Many people find this drug tax comical. The thought of a holder of drugs voluntarily coming to an office to weigh his drugs and pay a tax based upon that seems absurd. Why would someone already breaking a law be compelled to obey a tax ordinance? They won't. But there are still logical reasons to have this drug tax.

Throughout American history there have been many instances where tax laws have brought about the conviction of major criminals. Al Capone and many other underworld figures have been convicted on tax charges after escaping other attempts to end their illegal activities. In this sense, the law is good in its intentions.

However, for the government to put a tax on something it considers illegal is hypocritical. This tax now legitimizes, in a way, the possession of illegal substances. In a way, the government is saying it's all right to deal in illegal drugs just so long as you give us a cut of your profits. Is this truly the image toward drug use the Legislature wants to project in this state?

It would be better, it seems, if all this energy and money were put to the beneficial use of cutting this problem off at the source.

Faculty pay increases should be top priority

Salary adjustments by the Legislature this year show the Kansas Board of Regents granting University presidents higher pay increases ranging from 5 percent to 9.8 percent, while faculty members only received an average of a 3 percent increase.

The inequitable pay increases just further the notion that the regents, Gov. Mike Hayden and the Legislature believe administrators are a more important link in a university.

"The presidents received a greater increase than the faculty overall because they are the chief administrators, and we want to keep those positions competitive," said the former Regents chairman.

Unfortunately, that attitude is partly responsible for a high turnover rate for faculty. We can only hope the administrators who received the higher increases realize it is vitally important to build and maintain a strong and competent faculty at K-State. The faculty is the heart and soul of the University, and it is a travesty when a professor leaves K-State because it ranks 49th of 50 land-grant universities in faculty pay.

K-State's chief administrator, President Jon Wefald, has voiced concerns about losing competent faculty because of comparatively low salaries. But only if he can convince the regents, the governor and the Legislature of this problem will real parity be attained.

Covert operation plan an ominous revelation

If you were listening closely to the Iran-Contra hearings Friday and again Monday, you might have noted some ominous implications from the testimony of Lt. Col. Oliver North.

North told the committees of plans the former CIA director, the late William Casey, had to use the secret fund from arms sales to Iran for an "off-the-shelf, self-sustaining" operation to finance covert operations around the world.

Since the operation would not be financed by the government, it could engage in virtually any covert activity its chiefs deemed necessary or worthy, yet they would not be accountable to the U.S. government or public.

Perhaps equally ominous were the implications of a plan for martial law which North once presented to his superiors for approval.

Jack Brooks, D-Texas, said he read about the plan in the Miami Herald, which reported last week that North "helped draw up a controversial plan to suspend the Constitution in the event of a national crisis, such as nuclear war, violent and widespread internal dissent or national opposition to a U.S. military invasion abroad."

It seems rather ironic that in this bicentennial of the Constitution, the public is kept uninformed about secret government agencies and plans to suspend the Constitution.

Will Poindexter point finger?

In the eight weeks of testimony prior to that of Lt. Col. Oliver North, the fired National Security Council aide, the stock line for almost everyone in Congress and the media seemed to be, "So and so's testimony raises almost as many questions as it answers." This was especially true of businessman Albert Hakim, his partner and former CIA officer retired Maj. Gen. Richard Secord and former National Security adviser Robert McFarlane.

But North, billed as a "national hero," the "fall guy," or the "loose canon on the guinea of state," depending on your point of view, was supposed to clear up all that. For example, he was supposed to answer what has apparently become for the investigating committees the most important question of the Iranamok scandal — whether President Reagan knew profits from the arms sales were used for Contra military aid.

North did not conclusively answer this BIG question since he said he assumed Reagan knew of his actions, but he did not have any proof to that effect. Like others, North raised perhaps as many questions as he answered — questions about legality, Reagan's credibility and shadow governments. But he also answered some questions, and did much to answer others.

North's testimony should leave no question who will be, in the words of Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., "the single most important witness this committee will hear from" — former National Security adviser John Poindexter. North's insistence that he acted with approval from his superiors and that he repeatedly requested presidential approval leaves Poindexter in a position either to accept responsibility for approving North's actions or to pass blame "up the line" to the only person above Poindexter — the president himself.

Poindexter, who begins testifying today, should be able to answer the BIG question, and many others on the Iran arms sales, the Contra supply effort and the extent of Reagan's knowledge of both. If statements from other officials are any indication of what Poindexter will say, the jig may be up for our man in the Oval Office. For example, McFarlane testified that Reagan knew of

Collegian

NSC involvement in the Contra operation. He said he thought it illegal at the time but that Reagan "had a far more liberal interpretation" than he did.

Besides North's appearance last week in which he said he had always assumed Reagan knew, the Tower Commission Report also contains a North memo stating, "...The president obviously knows why he has been meeting with several select people to thank them for support for democracy in (Central America)."

Two days before these hearings began, chairman of the investigating committees Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, told "Meet the Press" that Reagan knew of Contra money provided by foreign countries. He suggested the administration had solicited military aid for the Contras — something Reagan denies and something North perhaps admitted to last week despite objecting to the word "solicitation." Sunday, Inouye said he stood by his statement and that Reagan "needs to examine the facts."

Perhaps even more indicative of what Poindexter might say is a story by the Washington Post from March 8. The story quotes an informed source as saying that Poindexter might testify that on two occasions he told Reagan the Contras were benefiting from the arms sales profits: "Poindexter did not tell Reagan there was an illegal diversion of money but that funds for the Contras contributed by the Iranians or Israelis were 'an ancillary benefit' of the sales...."

Another answer North's testimony could provide might be to questions about the future of Attorney General Edwin Meese III. North asserted that Meese was more aware of details about a November 1985 arms shipment to Iran and the attempts to cover it up by lying to Congress than Meese has portrayed himself. Further, a grand jury has turned up testimony that Meese approved North's actions after White House aides complained that North might be breaking laws.

Meese has denied involvement or declined comment on either matter, but he is scheduled to testify sometime before the committees finish up. Since Meese originally revealed the diversion of profits to the Contras, he has consistently portrayed himself as someone outside this scandal. However, if the committees find conflicting evidence from North's testimony or that of others, it could well be Meese's undoing.

A final question North's testimony might provide a partial answer to would be one for history buffs. For four decades many people have asked the question: How could a modern industrial and presumably civilized nation, such as Germany or Italy, willingly acquiesce to Nazi atrocities? North's testimony and the reaction to it do much to provide an answer.

After North said he had lied to Congress, after he said that Congress was responsible for this mess because of its "unpredictable" policy toward the Contras, and after he admitted to plans to use a secret fund from arms sales to sponsor covert operations free from Congressional restrictions (in effect, setting up a shadow government), public opinion polls showed overwhelming support for him. There were even calls for a presidential bid.

This is the man who is largely responsible for procuring the funds needed to kill more than 17,000 Nicaraguans, sending more than 2000 missiles to a terrorist regime, planning the senseless Grenada invasion of 1983 and engineering an assassination attempt on Libya's Moammar Gadhafi, which missed Gadhafi, but killed his daughter and other civilians.

At a demonstration outside the Capitol Friday, a young man dressed in Army-style clothing shouted into a bullhorn, "Does Congress have the right or mandate to conduct a witchhunt against Oliver North?"

"No!" the crowd shouted, and with that history buffs had much of their answer.

Editor,
 Re: Brian Jones' article (June 30) on Nicaragua and John Exdell's article (July 9) on the same topic. Another exchange of volleys from the two diametrically opposed schools of thought concerning the Sandinistas. Seldom have I witnessed anyone change their opinion as a result of these exchanges. They appear to result from the "You gave us a shot, now we'll give you a shot" mentality (not unlike the bean-ball mentality in major league baseball).

Exdell begins his barrage by telling us that he's going to set us straight concerning the "exaggerations, half-truths and outright falsehoods" being advanced by the Jones' camp. He then goes on to take that same set of observations that Jones had used to prop up his right-wing argument and uses them to prop up his left-wing argument. Throughout the article there is little evidence of disagreement over the occurrence of the incidents themselves, only over their appropriate interpretation.

Adherents to these two disparate political ideologies imply that if anyone truly understood the situation in Nicaragua then they could not but agree with them (and thus totally disagree with the other viewpoint). Sorry guys, complex situations such as this are never as black-and-white as you continually paint them. Thus, most people's feelings regarding the troubles in Nicaragua reside between your two extremes, and until you begin to treat this topic in a less stridently ideologic manner than you have in the past you will only be talking to yourselves.

Allow Waldheim in

Editor,
 I am writing to express my alarmed concern over the recent actions of U.S. officials toward the head-of-state of a friendly nation, President Kurt Waldheim of Austria. The decision of late May resulting in Waldheim's inability to enter the United States was unwarranted and offensive.

I was raised in this country to believe we held very sacred the statement that a person is innocent until proven guilty. Obviously I was mistaken, and it is now permissible for U.S. officials to deny this principle to certain individuals they feel are unworthy of our system of justice. I don't remember voting for the reinstatement of Roman law.

Our government's actions toward the agents of National Socialism seem at best paradoxical and at worst unethical. While the world watches, we admonish Kurt Waldheim for his participation in the horrible crimes of Hitler's "Final Solution," feeling the actions of this former secretary general of the United Nations are grounds enough for the severing of diplomatic ties and the alienation of a friendly world leader.

But out of the media spotlight the past actions of the United States have shown them to use war criminals and not punish them, as in the case of Klaus Barbie, the so-called "Butcher of Lyon," who was recently convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to life in prison.

Barbie was hired as a U.S. intelligence agent immediately following the war, and after his participation in Cold War activities was given a new identity, Klaus Altmann, and safe transport to Bolivia. It seems the United States is interested more in maintaining its appearance than in taking an ethical stand.

Though I am unhappy about the way Waldheim handled the charges of which he is accused, he is still yet to be proven guilty. As far as Waldheim's remarks about his "incomplete memory" concerning his participation in the German army, we can rest assured that far worse than being barred from the United States, is the bestowing upon Waldheim a spot among the other heads of state who also complain about forgetting important matters of life and death.

An officer escorts a subject after the person had been caught drinking beer on the premises.

Fans line up outside the coliseum to hear the heavy metal sound of Motley Crue.

Stephen Mashburn, co-director of the Wichita Street Ministries, broadcasts his beliefs.

Members of the Federation for Rockers' Rights sets up a sign on the lawn in front of the Kansas Coliseum. This group took partial credit for persuading the Sedgwick County Commission to allow Motley Crue to perform.

Crue Strikes Controversy

As the sound checks for the rock concert thumped from inside the Kansas Coliseum Friday evening, Stephen Mashburn, co-director at the Wichita Street Ministry, belted out his feelings about Christianity through a public address system to the fans waiting outside.

The ministry, along with the National Federation for Decency, butted heads during the past few weeks with the Federation for Rockers' Rights concerning Friday's Motley Crue concert.

The controversy started on June 24 as the NFD temporarily convinced the Sedgwick County Commission to ban Motley Crue from its scheduled performance.

Brad Bennett, chairman of the Sedgwick County Chapter of the NFD, said it was his group that supplied the quotes and spearheaded the effort to ban Motley Crue.

Two days later, a reversal in the decision resulted from a second hearing of the commission.

The meeting was called after the Federation for Rockers' Rights, a Wichita-based group that supports concertgoers' rights, protested the ban.

The premise of Federation for Rockers' Rights is freedom of choice and to make sure that the NFD and the Wichita Street Ministry are prevented from harassing concertgoers or from interrupting the show, said William Bushey, a member of the Federation for Rockers' Rights.

"I don't know if we were ultimately responsible (in getting the concert reinstated), but I think we had a major part in it," Bushey said.

The controversy continued Friday evening as soon as the gates opened at 5 p.m.

Fans began filtering into the coliseum, and about 1,000 scrambled for the remaining tickets available at the box office. Lines then formed behind the complex's four major entrances for the sold-out event.

Opposition from all sides began to set up their individual camps.

The first group to start the proceedings was the Wichita Street Ministry. The group was greeted with a roar from the fans waiting in line when Mashburn began to tell the crowd his feelings about Christianity.

Mashburn, who was paralyzed in a 1969 diving accident, has been going to concerts for six years to share his views.

"We're out here sharing Jesus," he said.

The NFD had people out to monitor the concert and to collect evidence that may violate obscenity and other laws.

"We write down direct quotes from the bands that may be breaking obscenity laws and supply them to county commissioners and legal authorities," Bennett said. "We also monitor alcohol consumption, marijuana use and lewd behavior."

The group not only monitored the outside of the coliseum but did most of the work inside during the concert, spending more than $60 to get the five members inside, he said.

"Most people leave it up to people like us to dig up the evidence," Bennett said. "Most parents ignore the problem, saying we went through our phase so we'll let them go through their (phase), and they never confront it."

Bennett said he has been asked what right his group had in monitoring the concert.

"I just say I'm exercising my right as a citizen," he said.

But Bushey said he believes the NFD is only a religious pressure group.

"They're (the NFD) just a smokescreen for a pressure group attempting to force one particular religious viewpoint on the public at large," Bushey said.

Bushey vowed to appear in front of the Sedgwick County Commission again.

"We (the Federation for Rockers' Rights) will appear in front of the Sedgwick County Commission to fight age limitations and any other infringements on constitutional choices," he said.

Members of the crowd also had their opinions.

One individual saw some good that might come about if an age restriction was placed on the attendance of concerts.

"Some good things could come out of it," said Mike Green of Pretty Prairie. "I've seen 3-year-olds at concerts, and I don't think they should be exposed to the violence, drugs and fights. So I think an age limit like 16 (years) would be good."

Another fan pointed out that Wichita and Sedgwick county would lose out on revenue.

"If we have the city commission telling the band how to act, they're not going to come," said Robert Moreno of Wichita.

Fans wait beneath a sign warning them about taking illegal substances into the coliseum. Fans began lining up shortly after the gates opened at 5 p.m. for the sold-out concert.

A rowdy fan stands on the ledge of the balcony at the Kansas Coliseum in Wichita before the Motley Crue concert Friday evening. The cross belongs to the Wichita Street Ministry. Members were broadcasting their beliefs from a balcony. Controversy struck the band when the Sedgwick County Commission prohibited it from performing, then reversed the decision two days later.

Trapshooters prepare for clay pigeon shootout

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State trapshooting team, a sport not funded by the University, will be headed for the Grand American Shootout Aug. 17 at Vandalia, Ohio, and could come back with a national title, said Ed Bednarz, junior in education and team member.

"As a team, we think we have a pretty good chance of winning the thing (title)," he said.

Bednarz said traditionally the East Coast is the big trapshooting area.

"Schools like Penn State, Ohio State and Harvard will be there, and I think we'll see how good we really are," he said. "This thing is so big some of us might do as well as we did at KTA (Kansas Trap Association Shoot), but we'll have to see how we feel when we get there."

Bednarz said the winning team last year shot 867 clay pigeons out of 1,000. The K-State team won the KTA team title, gunning down 937 out of 1,000.

"That's a difference of 70, and that's a good advantage to have going into this competition," he said.

Team members are Bednarz; Larry Drake, sophomore in agriculture economics; Dell Dieball, senior in animal sciences and industry; Kurt Maurath, senior in agriculture mechanization; and Phil Windler, graduate student in business administration.

Bednarz said he considers himself a rookie on the team.

"My roommate (Drake) and the others have been shooting for about five to 10 years now," he said. "Me, I just started getting into trapshooting last March."

Bednarz said on his first time out, he shot 23 out of 25 clay pigeons.

"I thought that was pretty good myself," he said. "I know there are some guys who can hit 25 of 25, but I'm just starting out and that isn't bad at all."

And as a team, they haven't been bad at all.

In May, they won the Cornhusker Shoot, bringing home eight trophies and finishing as the high-scoring team.

In June, they took part in the Kansas Trap Shoot. The top five scores in the contest would qualify for the Grand American Shoot. The K-State squad finished with scores high enough to qualify all five members.

Jackson may play two sports

By The Associated Press

AUBURN, Ala. — Heisman Trophy winner Bo Jackson, who once bypassed professional football for a major league baseball career with the Kansas City Royals, is expected to announce Tuesday that he will carry the ball for the Los Angeles Raiders of the NFL.

Jackson and his agent, Richard Woods of Mobile, scheduled a news conference for 12:30 p.m. EDT Tuesday at Auburn to announce his decision on signing a contract to play for the Raiders after the baseball season ends.

The rookie outfielder for the Kansas City Royals turned down a $5 million contract from the Tampa Bay Buccaneers following the 1985 season, when he won the Heisman at Auburn and set the school's all-time rushing record. At the time, he said he would never play football again.

Woods, who met over the weekend with Raiders owner Al Davis, was not immediately available for comment Monday on any terms of a contract with the Raiders, but he said Sunday night in a telephone interview that such an agreement is "very likely."

"The prospects of him playing baseball for the Royals and football for the Raiders are excellent," Woods said.

In Toronto Saturday, Jackson announced he wanted to play for the Raiders, which made him their seventh-round draft pick this year. But he said his decision to return to football for at least part of one season does not mean his baseball career is over.

"Once I said I'll play baseball, I meant it," Jackson said. "I'm a baseball player now, and I'll always be a baseball player. I'll be a baseball player until they tear the jersey off my back."

At the All-Star break, Jackson was hitting .254 with 18 home runs and 45 runs batted in. He also had 112 strikeouts in 277 at-bats, which is on a pace to break the all-time single-season record of 189 strikeouts.

As a football player at Auburn, Jackson gained 4,303 yards on 650 carries, good for a per-carry average of 6.6 yards and a per-game average of 113.2 yards. His best season was 1985, when he churned out 1,786 yards and scored 17 touchdowns.

Avron Fogelman, co-owner of the Royals, said Jackson's contract will be restructured to protect the team in case he is injured on the football field. Fogelman, who met with Jackson over the weekend, said he never considered giving Jackson an ultimatum to choose between the two sports.

"I wanted to hear from Bo first, to find out what his objectives in life were first," Fogelman said. "I have to recognize that if a man has the talents that he has, the right way to do things is to give him that opportunity to help determine how good he is in football."

Royals General Manager John Schuerholz said he doubted whether Jackson could play both sports.

"The question is, can anybody withstand the physical stress of football playing for a limited amount of games, and maintain the strength and agility of 162 games of baseball? I just don't know," he said.

"We're willing to let him try it for one year," Schuerholz said.

"Hey," he said, "a tree is a tree. I think hitters are concentrating more."

Pedro Guerrero of the Los Angeles Dodgers has no theory.

"They say the ball is jumping more but I don't see that," he said. "I hit 30 every year. I've got 19. I'll get my 30. Go ask that guy with 33."

McGwire, the guy with 33, is as puzzled as anybody.

"It's unexplainable," he said. "I've hit home runs throughout my career but it's a surprise that I've hit so many up here in so short a period. I'm doing nothing different. I'm the same hitter I was in college, just a little older. I have a little bit of an idea of what pitchers throw because of advance scouting."

The most prevalent theory is that the baseball is livelier. Rawlings Sporting Goods, which manufactures major league balls, insists there has been no change in the specifications.

All-Stars speak out on lively baseballs

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND — While starters Bret Saberhagen and Mike Scott prepared Monday to test All-Star power, baseball prepared new tests for what is being called a livelier ball.

Saberhagen, the top pitcher in the American League at 15-3, and Scott were named starting pitchers for Tuesday evening's 58th All-Star Game at the Oakland Coliseum.

And while the pitchers debated why home runs have increased by 22 percent this year, American League President Dr. Bobby Brown announced both leagues would begin laboratory testing to determine whether the ball is more lively.

"We're going to repeat tests we conducted in 1984 when we awarded the ball contract to Rawlings," Brown said. "We don't expect any difference."

Brown said results would be back within 14 days "and possibly a lot sooner."

The lively ball debate dominated discussion at Monday's pre-workout news conference.

"Is the ball juiced?" repeated National League President A. Bartlett Giamatti, the former president of Yale University. "No more than I am, sir."

Scott and Saberhagen each have allowed 12 home runs this season but are split on the reasons.

"Is it juiced? I think it is," Scott said. "I can't prove anything. But when a guy hits a fly ball, it seems like I have to hold my breath."

Saberhagen attributed the increased homers to three factors.

"Players are stronger, the ball is a little juiced-up and the wood for bats is a little better," he said.

rick Sutcliffe, who is likely to pitch for the NL, scoffed at suggestions the ball is livelier.

"I think pitchers needed an excuse. Every now and then, you have to give the hitters credit," Sutcliffe said. "I pitch in Wrigley Field. You could hit a tomato out of there."

Either way, Saberhagen, Scott and the rest of the pitchers must cope with power-packed lineups.

Rickey Henderson will lead off for the AL and be followed by Don Mattingly, Wade Boggs, George Bell, Dave Winfield, Cal Ripken, Terry Kennedy, Willie Randolph and Saberhagen. Oakland rookie Mark McGwire, leading the majors with 33 homers, is an AL reserve.

The Coliseum is not regarded as a hitter's ballpark and the game will begin at 5:30 p.m. local time (7:30 p.m. Manhattan time on cable channels WDAF 4 and KSNT 7) to accommodate NBC-TV. The network has its own troubles, however, as strikes by cameramen, technicians and directors have wiped out two-thirds of the production crew.

These are the probable starting lineups for the American and National League teams for the 58th All-Star Game, to be played tonight at the Oakland Alameda County Coliseum:

A sellout crowd of 50,000 and clear skies are predicted as the AL tries to win consecutive All-Star Games for the first time since 1957-58. Despite a 3-2 loss last year, the Nationals have won 13 of the past 15 games.

Kansas City third baseman Kevin Seitzer and Seattle second baseman Harold Reynolds will replace George Brett and Lou Whitaker on the American League All-Star team roster, it was announced Saturday.

Brett, of the Royals, and Detroit's Whitaker were both reserves. Brett, who had been elected to the All-Star game 11 straight years, said a sore shoulder would have limited him to pinch-hitting duties, and Whitaker indicated he was tired and needed a rest.

Seitzer and Reynolds will make their first All-Star appearances.

Seitzer, a rookie, is batting .306 with 38 RBI and 53 runs scored. Reynolds is hitting .271 and leads the league with 31 stolen bases.

Manhattan set to host NBC series

By The Collegian Staff

For all those people waiting for the World Series to start, don't fret; it's just a month away.

The 1987 National Baseball Congress Hap-Dumont Youth World Series will be Aug. 8-12 at Cico Park. This is the third year for the tournament and the second time that Manhattan has hosted the event. Manhattan was the site of first NBC World Series in 1984. Last year's tournament was in Minnesota.

A banquet will kick off the Series at 6 p.m. Aug. 7 in City Park. Guest speaker will be Lou Brock, former player for the St. Louis Cardinals and current Hall of Fame baseball player.

Fifteen teams planning to take part in the World Series come from North Dakota, South Dakota, Colorado, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Wyoming, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas, Ohio, Illinois and Kentucky. The host team is Kentucky Fried Chicken.

The Optimists Club will be offering a Foster Parent Program for players who would like to stay in Manhattan homes the week of the tournament. Anyone interested in being a Foster Parent may call Ron Fehr at 537-0056, ext. 263.

Tickets may be purchased for $5 at the Parks and Recreation Office in City Park and Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurants.

Major sponsors of the event are Kentucky Fried Chicken, Hardee's and Campbell's Distributors.

New York ends quest, hires coach

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The New York Knicks' 84-day search for a new coach ended where it started Monday: with Rick Pitino, who turned Providence from a college doormat to a Final Four team in two years.

Pitino, a Knicks' assistant under Hubie Brown from 1983 to 1985, was named the team's coach at a news conference at Madison Square Garden.

The 34-year-old New York native was the first candidate interviewed by the team after it fired Coach Bob Hill and General Manager Scotty Stirling on April 20. He withdrew his name from consideration May 1 after the Knicks failed to meet his hiring deadline, but changed his mind when the team offered him the job last week.

Pitino, who recently signed a five-year contract extension at Providence, said leaving the school was the "most difficult decision of my life."

"I was 100 percent happy there," he said. "But I couldn't turn down the challenge of coaching the Knicks. If I didn't take the job, I would have always wondered about it."

Pitino and the president of Providence, the Rev. John Cunningham, said his contract at the school did not contain a buyout clause.

"I had a long talk with him Saturday morning and told him Providence College would not stand in the way of his professional advancement," Cunningham said. "He did not ask me to get out of the contract. I extended it to him."

Pitino said he didn't accept the Knicks offer until Monday morning, after meeting with his Providence players. He said he would not have taken the job if any of his players objected, but none of them did.

"We love each other at Providence, and it's difficult to leave the ones you love," Pitino said. "But they are still a part of my life, and always will be."

In his first year at Providence, Pitino took over a team that was 11-20 the year before and led them to a 17-14 record and a berth in the National Invitation Tournament. Last season, he guided the Friars to a 25-9 record and a trip to the Final Four, where they lost to Big East rival Syracuse in the semifinals.

In New York, Pitino will be facing a similar rebuilding job. The Knicks finished the regular season with a 24-58 record and missed the playoffs for the third year in a row.

"I'm not naive," he said. "If I didn't think we could win right away, I would not have taken the job."

Pitino said he would use the same fast-paced, team-oriented style that he featured at Providence.

"We were one of the highest scoring teams in the country, so it's obvious I like an exciting offense," he said. "But I also know that it takes solid team defense to win in the NBA."

All-Stars attempt to explain increase in home run hitting

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND — Rookie Mark McGwire of the Oakland Athletics, baseball's hottest long ball hitter with 33 home runs at the All-Star break, is enjoying his Ruthian-run, but is at a loss to explain it.

"I don't try to hit home runs," he said. "They just come. It's rare that you try for a home run. It's the time that you don't try that you hit them."

Ozzie Virgil of the Atlanta Braves, who reached the All-Star break with 20 homers, agreed with McGwire.

"I can't swing for homers," he said. "That won't work. When you hit them, guys say, 'You swung so easy.' When you swing hard, it takes you out of your groove and throws your timing off."

Virgil thinks it's a matter of mistakes.

"Look," he said, gesturing around the NL dressing room, "if you took a bunch of these guys and threw the ball down the middle to them, you'd get a good number of them to hit it out. I just think pitchers have made more mistakes."

Are hitters swinging for the seats? "Home runs put money in your pocket," Virgil said with a smile. "That's what people want to see."

Trying for homers Monday at the All-Star workout's home run hitting contest, McGwire hit one and Virgil two. Andre Dawson had four as the NL outthundered the AL 6-2.

Kirby Puckett and Dave Winfield declined to participate in the homer contest, subscribing to Virgil's theory that it would throw off their swings.

Someone suggested to Jeffrey Leonard of the San Francisco Giants, who has hit 16, that hitters were working with better bats. That is the theory of some sluggers, including Philadelphia's Mike Schmidt, who reached the All-Star Game with 19. Leonard looked incredulous.

Candidate delivers Union public forum

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

John T. Fairman, the last of three candidates vying for the position of assistant vice president/director of University Relations, said interaction is the best tool for this job. He spoke Friday during a public forum in the K-State Union.

Speaking to 18 people, Fairman said he would not stay in his office. The first step in building a positive internal image is to talk to faculty, students, community and government leaders and find out their views of K-State, he said.

"I'd like especially to meet with all the deans and create a better awareness of accomplishments within departments," Fairman said. "Once the campus feels good about itself, we can move that feeling outward to the community and state."

For example, an English professor giving a lecture elsewhere should be able to do some P/R for the Division of Biology if a prospective student asks about the programs, he said.

Fairman has five years of experience as director of public affairs at Western Illinois University, Macomb. He also served as the director of news at Northern Michigan University, Marquette, he said.

Marketing is a challenge many universities will face sooner or later, Fairman said. At first, people view it as an unpleasant "sell-job," but they soon realize it is an opportunity to evaluate themselves and make adjustments.

Fairman said the public relations staff often provides the first impression people receive of a university, so their projects must be good.

"I would never ask a person to lie about a weak program," he said. "If we can only do a sloppy job, we shouldn't do it at all."

Fairman listed eight projects he would like to try at K-State. Helping rural schools improve the quality of education, publicizing K-State's research, becoming involved in key issues such as atomic waste and expanding the study of ethics in professions were the first four he suggested.

He would also like to begin 30-second television commercials.

"Several of our competing universities are using something called 'video viewbooks,'" Fairman said. "These are five to 10-minute overviews of K-State which can be sent directly to the homes of prospective students."

Sponsoring media, Legislature and business days are a good idea, he said. Inviting people to tour departments would make them more aware of what the University is doing.

Another idea involved sports releases. As a sports editor for the Big Rapids Pioneer in Michigan, Fairman said athletics traditionally got much of the space in newspapers.

"About five years ago at Western Illinois University, we started insisting that spotlights (articles sent to a student's hometown) include the person's major and a quote about his academic progress from him or his coach," he said. "Eventually, the faculty began to feel better about the amount of sports coverage because academics was a part."

Fairman's final suggestion involved placement firms. These companies contact national publications and give them faculty names as sources for articles, Fairman said. It is costly, but the university looks good.

Sell-out mob on its toes for 'Crue'

By JUDD ANNIS

Wichita's Kansas Coliseum was the site of the heavy metal extravaganza of the summer, a concert which featured Whitesnake and Motley Crue, two of the most sought after metal bands of the year.

Friday night's concert, which sold out several hours before showtime, created a party atmosphere for about 12,200 grateful fans. Most in attendance were just glad to be there, despite the efforts of area church and decency groups to stop the show.

Opening the concert was Whitesnake, whose self-titled album is the fifth best-selling album in the country. Lead singer David Coverdale, formerly of Deep Purple, headed an all-new lineup of veteran rockers that worked well together on stage.

The band members' familiarity with touring and performing was evident by their clean, powerful sound, and Coverdale's voice sounded at full strength after his recent operation for a sinus infection.

Highlights of the band's 30-minute performance were a blistering drum solo by drummer Tommy Aldridge, a guitar duo by guitarists Adrian Vandenberg and Vivian Campbell, and the performance of the band's current hit single "Still of the Night."

Oddly enough, Whitesnake played only five songs, which drew a resounding and deserved "boo" from the sellout crowd.

The show's headline act, Motley Crue, took the stage after a brief intermission starting with "All in the Name of..." from their current album "Girls, Girls, Girls" (the second best-selling album in the country), followed by "Live Wire" from the band's first LP "Too Fast For Love."

This early mixture of old and new set up a well-balanced show that didn't rely on any of the band's four albums too much and kept the crowd on their toes. Classics like "Smokin' in the Boys' Room" and a frenzied rendition of "Jailhouse Rock" brought the crowd to its feet as easily as any of the Crue's original numbers.

The tighter-sounding and better-performed songs in the show, however, were taken from the band's second album "Shout at the Devil," featuring such favorites as "Red Hot," "Too Young to Fall in Love," "Ten Seconds to Love" and "Looks That Kill."

Drum enthusiasts enjoyed drummer Tommy Lee's revolving drum kit, which looked like a chrome roll cage and turned Lee 360 degrees in any direction as he played. Although Lee's setup was imaginative and a crowd pleaser, it was obvious that there was a trade-off of technology for raw talent.

Not forgetting their roots, Motley Crue ended its first encore with a tribute to AC-DC, Aerosmith and Led Zeppelin. The second and final encore was their current hit "Girls, Girls, Girls."

Colleges acquire project directors

Two colleges have gained program coordinators in their divisions of continuing education.

Barbara Newhouse is the new program coordinator for the College of Education's credit and non-credit programs. As coordinator, she will be responsible for providing advanced educational opportunities for school districts in northeast Kansas.

The Division of Continuing Education's specialist for the College of Architecture and Design is Jenny Penny Oliver. Oliver's new duties will be to develop credit and non-credit activities in architecture and design.

Department head earns recognition

The head of the Department of Management was named Outstanding Teacher of the Year in the College of Business Administration.

Yar Ebadi, associate professor in management, was selected by a committee of students and faculty for the $500 award. The selection process was based on interviews as well as class and peer evaluations.

Ebadi joined the management faculty in 1983 and was named department head in March. He now teaches senior and graduate level management courses.

Meat association honors professor

An animal science professor received an award from the American Meat Science Association at the University of Minnesota at St. Paul, Wednesday.

Michael Dikeman, professor of animal science and industry, received the Distinguished Teaching Award from the AMSA at its annual meeting.

Dikeman has been doing research on beef germ plasm in cooperation with the U.S. Meat Animal Research Center. He has done committee work aimed at improving teaching and coursework, and was the coach of the student meat judging team last year.

Iran attacks freighter; no casualties reported

By The Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — Two Iranian gunboats pounded a French freighter with rocket and machine-gun fire for 20 minutes before dawn Monday in the Persian Gulf. Iraq said later that its warplanes raided a nearby Iranian island.

No casualties were reported in the freighter attack off Saudi Arabia.

Capt. Max Gangneur of the 24,540-ton container ship Ville d'Anvers told The Associated Press by radio that fire from the Iranian vessels raked the crew's quarters at 2:25 a.m. while most of the 19 French sailors were sleeping.

"It's a miracle we suffered no casualties," said Gangneur, 49. He said the freighter's hull and engine room were badly damaged and its electricity supply was cut off.

The Ville d'Anvers was hit about 100 miles south of Kuwait's al-Shuaiba port, where it had unloaded cargo. Iran began last September to concentrate its gulf attacks on ships owned by or serving the emirate, which supports Iraq in the nearly 7-year-old war.

Gangneur's ship was headed for Dubai, but changed course for the repair facilities of Bahrain after the attack.

The vessel was hit about 40 miles off Farsiya, which is midway between Iran and Saudi Arabia. It is one several Iranian islands on which the fanatical Revolutionary Guards base their gunboats.

Iraq said within hours of the attack that its jets bombed oil installations on Farsiya, inflicting "devastating blows."

A military communique broadcast on Baghdad radio said Iraqi fighter-bombers also scored direct hits on a "a large maritime target," the Iraqi phrase for a tanker, in the gulf off Iran.

Iran said its naval air defenses shot down an Iraqi jet over the southern gulf at 10 a.m. Iraq's official news agency quoted a military spokesman as denying any aircraft losses.

Because of increased Iranian attacks on Kuwaiti shipping, the United States is registering 11 of the emirate's tankers so they can fly the American flag and be given U.S. Navy protection.

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's revolutionary Iranian regime has said Navy escorts will not deter it from attacking ships that serve Kuwaiti ports.

Korten did say the tape recording reinforces the importance in the minds of U.S. authorities of keeping a close watch on Marcos' activities. He said the tape shows Marcos' clear intention to topple the Aquino government.

Hirschfeld said he first met Marcos last Sept. 10, through Saudi businessman Mohammed al-Fassi, when the former Philippine leader asked Hirschfeld for help in obtaining citizenship in another country.

Hirschfeld said he sought citizenship for Marcos in Haiti, Belize, Bolivia, the Bahamas and other countries.

Students criticize in-state recruiting methods

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — State universities must do a better job of recruiting potential students if they want to compete with out-of-state schools, several recent high school graduates told lawmakers Wednesday.

They said the state should develop a scholarship program for middle-class students whose families are not eligible for federal student loans.

The students, National Merit scholars who will attend college this fall, discussed their experiences in choosing a college with the Legislative Educational Planning Committee, which is studying ways to keep the best students in the state. A survey last year indicated more than 50 percent of the state's National Merit semifinalists attended out-of-state universities.

The State of Kansas Scholarship Program was established in 1966 to provide scholarship monies to the Kansas students with the highest American College Test scores — if the students attend Kansas universities, said Mark Tallman, Associated Students of Kansas legislative director.

"The problem is that the students with the top scores are not necessarily eligible to receive financial aid under the federal guidelines," Tallman said. "So, quite a few of the state's top students end up not receiving money from the state."

"The colleges expect the parents to mortgage the house and go into debt," said Don Aye, of Allen, who plans to attend K-State. "It's just hard to scrape up the money."

Tallman said the committee intends to survey the National Merit scholars again this year to discover where the Kansas students decided to attend school and why.

For K-State in particular, the tone of comments made by the students seems to have improved over last year, Tallman said.

Although four of the six students plan to attend Kansas universities, they said they thought out-of-state schools, especially Missouri state schools, were much more aggressive in recruiting.

"I got a lot more calls from out-of-state schools," Aye said. "They really seemed to go all out to attract me to their schools, especially Northeast Missouri State and (the University of) Houston."

"Personally, I was impressed with K-State's recruiting, and I received a really nice scholarship."

The students also said some state universities, especially the University of Kansas, sent out "impersonal" information. Katherine Bradfield, of Emporia, who plans to attend The Wichita State University, said out-of-state schools sent her personal letters, one written by a student.

Poindexter refutes Reagan arms story

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former National Security Adviser John Poindexter testified Wednesday he never told President Reagan about using Iranian arms sales money for the Contras because "I wanted the president to be protected" from political embarrassment if the plan leaked out.

But, while supporting the president on that point, the former top White House aide contradicted Reagan on a second important issue in the congressional Iran-Contra hearings: He said the president initially approved selling weapons to Iran in late 1985 as a straight arms-for-hostages deal.

Poindexter, testifying under immunity from prosecution based on his words, said Lt. Col. Oliver North proposed using the Iranian money for the Contras at a time that United States humanitarian aid for the Nicaraguan rebels was running out. North was relaying an idea proposed in early 1986 by Israeli official Amiram Nir, Poindexter said.

Said Poindexter:

"The buck stops here with me. I made the decision. I thought I had the authority to do it. I thought it was a good idea...but I did not want him to be associated with the decision."

Poindexter testified in a slow, calm voice that he told neither the president, nor anyone else, about the diversion plan until last November when Attorney General Edwin Meese III began an inquiry.

North had testified that the late William Casey, director of the CIA, was in on the diversion plan from the beginning and not only embraced it enthusiastically but also wanted to create a permanent fund to carry out "off the shelf" covert operations.

Poindexter said also he didn't tell the president about which other countries were contributing funds for the Contras and that Reagan never asked.

He said Reagan knew generally what North was doing, but not in great detail.

Poindexter said that until the Meese inquiry he had not seen any of the memos North said he had sent him — with a request they be shown to the president — on the subject of the diversion of funds.

North testified he thought he had shredded all such memos but that the one Meese's investigators turned up apparently escaped destruction.

Except for that one, which he didn't see until last November, months after it supposedly was sent, Poindexter said, "I do not recall any memo that addressed the question of diversion."

Poindexter's testimony prompted House Majority Leader Thomas Foley, D-Wash., to ask how a president gets information "if honorable people can conceive it within their mandate and authority to make such decisions without the president's knowledge."

And Sen. William Cohen, R-Maine, commented that "the buck is supposed to stop at the top, not with a subordinate. I don't simply conclude because the president didn't know that it doesn't carry equally serious consequences."

Poindexter said Reagan's policy about supporting the Contras was well known and "I was convinced I understood the president's thinking on this and if I had taken it to him, he would approve it."

On the subject of the arms sales, Poindexter's testimony on Reagan approval undercut the president's own statements that the sales never were intended to be ransom for the hostages but were part of a broader effort to reach out to Iranians who might come to power after the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini "passed from the scene."

Copies of a presidential finding giving only the hostages' freedom as a reason for the sales exist, but a signed version apparently does not. Poindexter's predecessor in the White House job, Robert McFarlane, testified Tuesday that he doubted it was ever signed.

Poindexter, however, said Reagan did sign it, on Dec. 5, 1985, and Poindexter destroyed it.

"I tore it up and put it in the burn bag behind my desk," he said, after Meese told him last Nov. 21 that he was beginning an inquiry into the arms sales.

Poindexter testified that Reagan signed a second paper authorizing the sales on Jan. 17, 1986, in a version that also spoke of the broader attempt to forge an opening with Iran.

Summer program entertaining youth

By ANGELA D. MARKLEY
Collegian Reporter

When summer rolls around, parents are often faced with the question of what to have their children do that will keep them out of trouble, yet be fun and entertaining.

The solution could be Summer Adventure '87, a program that presents learning in an exciting and fun atmosphere.

"The kids involved in this program will experience a variety of interesting and unique topics through involvement," said Bill Butler, director of community education in the Division of Continuing Education and director of Summer Adventure '87.

Summer Adventure '87 is for children from kindergarten age through eighth grade and runs from June 8 through July 31. The program is divided into four two-week sessions.

"With our staff we are capable of handling a load of 144 kids each session. To date, we are averaging 40 to 45 students per session," Butler said.

The cost of the program varies because of meals and whether the child participates all day or for half the day.

Participants meet at 8 a.m. at Ahearn Field House and begin their day by taking swimming lessons in the Natatorium.

"Swimming is something all kids like to do and also need to know how to do well," said Scott Langton, program coordinator for community education.

"After swimming, the kids begin the enrichment program, which varies as to the age of the participants. All the kids are grouped according to school grades so they can learn from one another and help each other," Butler said.

Congressional hearings elicit different responses at K-State

Administrator feels common ground with fired NSC aide

By JACQUELINE JORDAN
Collegian Reporter

William Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service, has shared "a common ground" with Marine Lt. Col. Oliver North when he worked at the National Security Agency in the '70s.

"I feel some common ground toward him since I also served in the intelligence community, dealing with matters on a national level," Arck said.

Arck said he was drafted in 1972 and served in the Air Force at the National Security Agency as an intelligence analyst until 1974.

"What I did and where I worked is classified," he said. "I was then dealing with matters of national interest which involved the highest level of national security."

"What I know regarding national level intelligence is 13 years old and is probably now in history books."

When Arck was working at the National Security Agency, he was "a very small part of the whole intelligence community."

Arck said he sees both sides of the issue of North's part in the Iran-Contra affair — the American system on the one hand, and the other, North's position as a man serving his country.

"The American system has been here for over 200 years. The system has worked well, and I wouldn't trade it for any other system in this world, but there are areas where the American system does need improvement," he said.

Arck said it is not important for him to find out whether North is telling the truth or covering up for Reagan.

"Everything that the United States does cannot be revealed, out of necessity, to public knowledge (because of national security concerns)," Arck said. "On the other hand, what is of major concern is the fact that Congress would not know the extent of what was going on."

If North is covering for the president, he is justified because "that's his job," he said. But if he is not, then people should be concerned the president does not know about it.

Regarding Congress, Arck said a secret kept from Congress concerning national security is "not in the best interest to our national security," but at the same time, revealing information to the public can hurt the nation if classified information is leaked.

"The general public probably doesn't need to know much more

Majority of students, faculty queried believe North lying

By JACQUELINE JORDAN
Collegian Reporter

Following Marine Lt. Col. Oliver North's testimony at the Iran-Contra congressional hearing in Washington, D.C., the Collegian asked 25 students and faculty members what they thought about the controversial testimony.

The majority of the people said they received more information from the national television broadcast than from newspapers or radio. The print media ranked second over radio reports.

Alden Williams, professor of political science, said the American democratic system, which is based on the U.S. Constitution, "is at risk anytime the Constitution is ignored by anyone."

Williams said if those elected violate the Constitution, the American democratic system plays an important part in replacing them.

Miranda Mortlock, a graduate student in agronomy, said news reports coming from the BBC World Service "are more critical than news in America."

Thirty-six percent said their attitudes toward North had changed for the better, while 28 percent said their attitudes had not changed. In addition, 16 percent said they were undecided, while 8 percent said their attitudes changed for the worst. The rest did not comment.

The majority of those surveyed said they thought North was not telling the truth, but 12 percent said they thought he was. Twenty percent said they were undecided.

Eighty percent of the 25 surveyed said North is probably covering for the president, and 8 percent said they did not think he was. Four percent said they were undecided.

George Nicolaides, research assistant in physics, said the Iran-Contra hearing is like having "North dangle the million dollar bills in front of Congress' eyes."

"I don't think North is telling the truth, and I think Congress knows that, too," Nicolaides said.

Most of those surveyed said North was unjustified in breaking the law.

Jim Bae Park, graduate in electrical engineering, said North could be justified "because it isn't North's problem but the government's problem. North was just doing his work, obeying orders."

Parizadeh Korosh, a graduate student in computer science, said North is a man who gets the job done, and that one should ask what was the nature of his job instead of focusing

INTERNATIONAL Iran may attack, secure gulf ports

KUWAIT — Iran threatened on Wednesday to attack and seize any Persian Gulf ports made available to U.S. warships, which are expected to begin escorting Kuwaiti tankers under U.S. flags next week.

The head of Kuwait's oil tanker fleet said he expects a Kuwaiti vessel to reach the mouth of the gulf next Tuesday and join a super-tanker already waiting there. They are to hoist American flags and be given a U.S. Navy escort.

Iraq said its warplanes bombed Iranian offshore oilfields for the second straight day. The neighboring gulf nations have been at war since September 1980.

A dispatch from Iran's official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Parliament speaker Hashemi Rafsanjani as telling military commanders on Tuesday that "we will take American captives with their hands on their heads to prisoner-of-war camps" if U.S. ships intervene in the gulf.

It said Rafsanjani, addressing Arab nations in the region, declared, "If you put your bases or ports at the disposal of the United States, we would capture them and we would regard their seizure as being from American rather than from a neighboring state."

Another IRNA dispatch quoted deputy commander Ali Shamkhani of the Revolutionary Guards as saying the fanatical followers of revolutionary leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini would attack the U.S. warships.

Zia: car bombing work of Afghanis

KARACHI, Pakistan — President Mohammed Zia ul-Haq blamed Afghan agents Wednesday for car bombs that killed 75 people in the worst terrorist bombing in Pakistan's history.

Police and rescue workers removed the last of the bodies from the wreckage of the fashionable Saddar market and residential area, which was teeming with shoppers, commuters and street vendors when the bombs exploded Tuesday.

Weeping relatives tried to identify victims from grisly photographs posted on bulletin boards at Karachi's two central hospitals. More than 300 people were injured.

Pakistan's largest city was virtually shut down as government officials declared a three-day period of mourning.

No group has claimed responsibility for the blasts, said Zia, who toured the bombing site Wednesday.

NATIONAL U.S.: Pakistanis seek atom bomb

WASHINGTON — A Pakistani arrested on charges of trying to export a rare type of steel used in the manufacture of weapons-grade uranium was part of a broader effort by the Moslem nation to build nuclear arms, government and private experts said Wednesday.

Pakistan's drive to build a bomb dates from the explosion of a nuclear device in 1974 by India, its historic enemy, and has included theft, bribery and subterfuge to obtain technology and material, according to court records in the United States and Western Europe.

Despite the secrecy surrounding Pakistan's nuclear program, "a consensus seems to have emerged that Pakistan is at the nuclear-weapons threshold: it either possesses all of the components needed to manufacture one or several atom bombs or else remains just short of this goal," says Leonard Spector, a Washington-based nuclear proliferation expert and author of "Going Nuclear."

Pakistan wants the maraging 350 steel, as the special alloy is called, for centrifuges at a second uranium enrichment plant at its nuclear facility in Kahuta, 18 miles from the capital of Islamabad, Spector said.

A second plant would allow Pakistan to produce fuel for up to 10 bombs a year, whereas the one enrichment facility at Kahuta can produce 22 pounds of uranium annually, enough for about one bomb, said Spector.

Postal unions fail to reach contract

WASHINGTON — The nation's two largest postal unions on Wednesday broke off contract talks with the U.S. Postal Service, with a deadline for reaching a new accord only four days away.

"No further talks will be held from our end until the (postal unions') Joint Bargaining Committee can receive assurances from the Postal Service" that the new pact will not erode job security, said Dan Frank, a spokesman for the two large labor organizations, the American Postal Workers Union and the National Association of Letter Carriers.

Sources close to the troubled negotiations said that Kay McMurray, director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, had been contacted by attorneys for at least one of the unions.

But it could not immediately be determined whether McMurray or any of his mediators would get involved in the talks. The two sides are facing a 12:01 a.m. Tuesday deadline for reaching agreement on a new contract for the two unions.

for education as a property tax relief measure.

Members said they also would try to convince Gov. Mike Hayden and lawmakers to have the state keep a windfall it will receive because of federal tax reform. They said the state would not adequately finance education or would increase property tax burdens otherwise.

The members defended a budget proposal the board gave its support to Tuesday, one calling for $708.32 million in state spending for education for the next fiscal year, an 8.38 percent increase over the current fiscal year. The largest part of the proposed increase, $35 million, would be in general aid to the state's 305 local school districts.

In its meeting Tuesday, the board approved three proposals: one calling for a 1.28 percent decrease in spending, one keeping spending constant, and the one members said they preferred — to increase spending. The board will review proposals in August and give Hayden a final recommendation in September.

Hubbell and Board Chairman Bill Musick, a Minneapolis Republican, said the state could not afford the board's preferred budget proposal unless it kept an increase in state income tax revenue it expects to receive because of changes made in federal tax laws.

Trafficker testifies of drug smuggling

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A convicted cocaine trafficker told Congress Wednesday that he helped the Nicaraguan Contras smuggle drugs into the United States and ship automatic weapons and explosives to Central America.

George Morales, who is serving a 16-year federal prison sentence in Miami, also said he made payoffs to officials in Cuba and the Bahamas — countries he said were used to transship drugs and launder money. Panama was another money-laundering point, he said.

The 38-year-old Colombian-born American citizen described for a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on drugs a large-scale smuggling operation that used airplanes, helicopters and boats to make millions of dollars.

The Contras have repeatedly denied allegations of drug-smuggling. Contra spokesman Ernesto Palazio said the rebel organization is "more interested than anyone else in finding out if any of our people" were involved in such activity, so action can be taken.

But Palazio dismissed Morales' allegations, saying, "We've heard this gentlemen's accusations before. He is a convicted drug dealer."

Morales, who testified in the custody of federal marshals, said he had nothing to gain from appearing before the subcommittee, which is headed by Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. He volunteered to take a lie detector test to demonstrate the truthfulness of his statements.

Because of the nature of the drug business, Kerry said his panel was forced to gather information from witnesses who had been involved with narcotics.

Groups to expand use of Ahearn after Bramlage Coliseum in use

By The Collegian Staff

Ahearn Field House is facing the second major change in its 36-year history subsequent to the completion of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum in October 1988.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, one of three groups that primarily use Ahearn, will be relocated in the coliseum sometime in summer 1988. The move will allow for department expansion in Ahearn, said Mark Bonjour, assistant director of general services of Physical Facilities.

"Intercollegiate athletics still need to serve some of their own current needs or needs that they have not been able to fulfill in the past few years," Bonjour said.

Mike Jones, business manager for the athletic department, said most administrative offices in the department will be moved to the coliseum upon its completion, but the track, tennis and volleyball offices will remain in Ahearn.

The track office will stay in Ahearn because the indoor track will continue to be utilized, he said. Volleyball practices and games will be held in Ahearn, so the office will remain, as well.

Some administrative offices in the department will not be relocated, Jones said.

"Part of the ticket office will stay at Ahearn to serve the students and faculty," he said.

Jones said he has recommended to Facilities Planning that the basketball court at Ahearn be converted into three tennis courts.

The two other groups now using Ahearn are the Department of Physical Education and Leisure Studies and the Division of Continuing Education, said Helen Cooper, space analyst for Facilities Planning.

The two groups and Recreational Services, a minor user, will be given the option to expand their programs. Cooper has already contacted these groups to determine the degree of expansion.

Larry Noble, head and professor of the Department of Physical Education and Leisure Studies, said the department will be able to expand its administrative support in Ahearn when the athletic department's offices are relocated.

"We will be able to have nicer offices," he said. "We've never had a student lounge, and that's something other departments take for granted."

"When athletics moves out, we also hope to have the opportunity for early evening community fitness (programs)."

Noble said offices in the department are spread around in Ahearn, making it difficult for the faculty to interact.

"It interferes with their ability, and they don't interact very much," he said. "We also want the faculty to be located closer to the labs where they work."

Bobbie Flaherty, associate director of the Division of Continuing Education, said the division is requesting increased activity space in order to expand community education programs.

Aquatics, gymnastics and the martial arts probably will be expanded, she said.

Since moving to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex in 1980, Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said the Natatorium is the only service in Ahearn used by Rec Services.

Robel said no decision has been made on how to possibly use

Ahearn, but "staff discussion is continuing."

"We are still looking at what direction to take," he said. "There is no doubt in the winter months, October through March, that additional space could be used (by Rec Services)."

Ahearn has traditionally been scheduled to operate from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m., Bonjour said. He projected Ahearn will not be forgotten.

"I feel that Ahearn will be as busy or busier when the coliseum is completed as it is now," he said.

New groups will be invited to use Ahearn after the existing users have scheduled their events. Bonjour said no decisions have been made about who will be asked.

No plans of physical changes to the field house have been made, he said, but possibly some of the bleachers will be removed.

Cooper said the final decision on what Ahearn facilities will be used by the various departments will be made by the University administration.

"We are cooperating with the various users to come up with the best use for all users," she said.

The various Ahearn-user groups will be submitting their recommendations to Facilities Planning in the next few weeks.

Flaherty said she does not foresee a scheduling conflict with the various groups continuing to use Ahearn.

"The (Ahearn user) groups work well in accommodating each other's needs," she said.

Built in 1951, Ahearn was named after Mike Ahearn, director of athletics from 1930 to 1947. It was originally designed to accommodate 14,000 people, but fire code modifications have reduced its capacity to 11,220.

4-H clubs sponsor programs for urban children's interests

By ANGELA D. MARKLEY
Collegian Reporter

4-H has always been thought of as a club for children living on farms since many projects involve farm animals. This is no longer true due to some changes in the types of programs now offered.

The 4-H program is trying to get away from the stereotype that 4-H is for children from the rural areas and not for city children, said Carol Huneycutt, Riley County Extension 4-H agent.

"We feel that by implementing programs like these young kids can get involved and enjoy 4-H also," Huneycutt said.

Mini 4-H is a new program introduced to Riley County youth in March 1987.

"The traditional 4-H club cannot be joined by kids until they turn 7 years old," Huneycutt said. "This program is for younger kids from 5 to 8 years old who would like to be orientated into the 4-H program."

"The program orientates the parents as well as the younger kids into the projects that are offered by the program."

Currently there are three pilot clubs which have been started outside the city limits. These Mini 4-H clubs have been formed in the Sedalia, Riley and Leonardville areas.

The 39 program participants meet with their individual area club for one hour. How often they meet depends upon the club's activities.

"During their meeting the clubs are required to do some recreation, an action song, recite the 4-H pledge and work on a project activity," Huneycutt said. "The project activity may be some sort of craft or skill which is simple but skillful for kids of that age."

Huneycutt said the clubs are not only trying to teach parents about child development, but they are also teaching the child a new skill.

"Since 4-H competes with other family activities, we are hoping that the Mini 4-H will be a way to involve parents and their children at an early age and keep them involved and interested enough to continue with the 4-H experience," she said.

The Mini 4-H club was not only started to orientate children at an early age, but also to involve children from the city in 4-H.

"We have more city youth than rural youth, and to involve the city youth 4-H must make adjustments for this," said Louise Jahnke of the 4-H Program Development Committee.

"Through Mini 4-H, children can learn from projects but not by taking on more than they can handle," Jahnke said.

After School 4-H, another program started in March 1986, was designed for children whose parents are still at work when they are finished with school.

"One day a week for six weeks children from second to sixth grades meet and learn about something of importance rather than going home to an empty house and watching television," Huneycutt said.

"The older kids are taught about foods and nutrition or safety in the kitchen, while the younger kids are taught pet care or arts and crafts," she said.

Self-Determined 4-H is the newest program and is directed at kids who have a hobby and would like to do something with it.

Several areas involved with the Self-Determined program are dance, puppetry, archeology, modern railroading, stamp and key collecting and calligraphy, Huneycutt said.

"Judging of these is very difficult but is based on the project record sheet, which tells of achievement, leadership and how the kids have grown while challenging their project," she said.

Huneycutt said the county 4-H Program Development Committee is pleased with these new programs and members believe with the help of parents they will continue to follow their 4-H creed: "to make the best better."

Parents should inform teen's choice of music

The question of a teen-ager's right to choose the style of music he wants to listen to for entertainment has once again come under scrutiny during the past few weeks. A recent attempt to ban certain heavy-metal groups from performing in front of Kansas audiences has stirred up a storm of controversy.

Those who disapprove of groups like Motley Crue consider heavy-metal music dangerous for audiences, especially young audiences. These people often believe heavy-metal music encourages violence, promotes anti-Christian attitudes like devil-worshipping, and has even been responsible for an increase in the number of teen-age suicides in our country. They consider it their responsibility to remove this threat from society.

But isn't it an equally dangerous threat to have a small group of people dictating the attitudes and choices of those around them?

According to the rules of capitalism, if groups like Motley

Crue are found offensive by the audiences, then ticket sales will decline and the band will delete Kansas from their schedules for future tours.

Problem solved.

However, some will still claim that a young audience cannot make a truly informed decision about this type of entertainment. This is precisely the area this small group of people should focus their attentions upon.

By talking to their children and other children's parents, these people can make those around them aware of the dangers they see. If they succeed in convincing enough people of the danger, then ticket sales will decline.

In short, all of us are entitled to our opinions and even more importantly we all have the basic right to choose for ourselves. People who find groups like Motley Crue offensive should stop bullying the bands and attempt solid, informative communication with audiences and let them decide if Kansas is ready for heavy metal.

A lesson in heavy metal taste

Good morning, class. This is Music and Modern Society 101. Today we shall discuss the impact and consequences of heavy-metal music and the persons involved in this sector of society. There will be a quiz on Monday so pay close attention.

First off, what exactly is heavy-metal music? There are many answers to this question. Some say it is a contemporary mode of expression; some say it is a scheme to rid this country's youth of its weekly allowance. And yet others say it is simply the voice of Lucifer himself.

Which is the correct answer — A, B, C or D (all of the above)? It's difficult to say.

To find this answer we must probe the innermost sanctity of heavy-metal music and its fans. We must come to an understanding about those involved in every aspect of the heavy-metal movement. To help us in our quest we shall think of today's lecture as a lab experiment. We shall dissect the organism known in Latin as the "Headus bangerus."

The biography of a typical bangerus could read as follows: youthful (in teens to early 20s), outgoing, leaning toward rebellious, confident, strong-willed and slightly hard of hearing.

The anatomy of a Headus bangerus is unusual in many ways. The ear drum, for instance, is continually swelled, presumably a result of being buffeted by the noise of heavy metal. The forehead is strong and solid. It is quite often used as a ramming device at social gatherings and as a part of an intricate mating dance. The fingers are extra limber so as to accommodate the making of hand gestures.

The typical Headus bangerus will spend many hours each day near a stereo listening to loud, rhythmic distortions of contemporary instrumental tones. He will often violently shake his fist or jerk his head to and fro. This practice has scientists puzzled because there is no known link between the rhythms of heavy metal and the bangerus' nervous system that would cause such actions.

Collegian Columnist

Our specimen is attracted to and soothed by the obscene language that accompanies heavy-metal music. Consequently, an addiction to the music develops and, perhaps even more frightening, they start to attend Eddie Murphy movies.

The music itself is an interesting item. Upon listening to heavy metal one immediately realizes waltzing to the melody is impossible. Many find the music disturbing, not only for that reason, but because the lyrics project a bad image of women while projecting a good image of the automobile.

Notions of satanic messages have surrounded this music also. These accusations are based upon the theory of recording words and phrases in a backward fashion on albums and tapes. Our researchers at the University, however, found that all the heavy-metal music they listened to sounded the same when played either forward or backward.

The artists who perform this music, the Headus artisti, are viewed as idols by the Headus bangerus. Their lewd behavior seems to incite the bangerus into fits of hip thrusting, guitar busting, sex lusting and mind rusting. In return for this inspiration, the Headus artisti request that the bangerus spend as much money as possible on concert tickets, albums, T-shirts and other paraphernalia.

Now all of this is most curious, to say the least. The exact classification of the Headus bangerus and the Headus artisti are still unclear. Are they parasites? Are they beneficial organisms? How long are their lifespans, and what effect will they have on their fellow organisms?

Some extremists would have us believe there are absolutely no redeeming qualities in the bangerus or the artisti. Time and time again they call for a plan to force these species into extinction. The world will be a better place, they claim, when the youth of today are once again waltzing, doing barnyard chores and reading Laura Ingalls Wilder stories.

On the other hand, Dr. Barry Famous, a highly respected expert in sociology, has another idea. Dr. Famous suggests that the actions taken by the Headus bangerus are simply attempts to break the umbilical bind between themselves and their parents. He suggests that such scandalous behavior has been occurring for decades and that the only difference between today's rebels and yesterday's is the social mores and attitudes that surround them.

He points out that years ago the jitterbug seemed as evil as today's heavy metal simply because, compared to the social attitudes of the time, it was lewd and obscene. Today's society, however, is more open to lewdness and obscenity — in many cases it has become an art form. The rebellious actions of the Headus bangerus, therefore, must be even more extreme, creating the need for heavy-metal music.

So, as you can see, the views toward heavy-metal music and its followers remain varied and unsettled. Only after time has passed will we know all the answers for certain. Until then, however, you are all assigned a 10-page term paper on the subject, due next Friday. Have a pleasant weekend.

Class dismissed.

Manhattan needs bus system

If you look around town these days you can see a lot of changes as Manhattan makes its little push to become a burgeoning metropolis. Both downtown and Aggieville have projects in the making. Apparently one mall is not enough, for now an Aggieville merchant is going to provide us with a mini-mall.

With all this hustle and bustle one might think we were in the middle of a big city and not just a medium-sized town. Ironically though, some of the proposals for the town that would make it look even more like a city indicate the limited vision of their proponents. A prime example of this is the continued non-resolution of the parking problem on K-State's campus.

It seems that even with a declining enrollment there still aren't enough parking spaces on campus. The response to this problem (at the risk of oversimplifying) seems to be — "Let's pave the place over. Forget the past character of the campus, K-State may have been based on an agricultural tradition but we're in the '80s now and it's the Age of Concrete."

In all the discussions I've seen to this point about the parking problem it seems that certain assumptions are always taken for granted.

The main assumption is that parking should be provided for any and all people who want to park on campus.

The problem is not the lack of parking spaces on campus, the problem is with the attitudes of the people themselves.

I'd like to offer a few constructive suggestions for resolving this parking mess without paving the prairie or building a mega-

1) Restrict access to parking permits on the basis of need. This is done already to an extent since faculty receive a higher percentage of permits than students. The most obvious criterion is that of distance from school. Why should someone who lives at the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Vattier Street have the same right to a parking permit as someone who lives on the edge of town? A second criterion could be that of age. Would anyone seriously argue that a 20-year-old student should have the same right to a permit as a 60-year-old student?

2) Set up varying zones of parking. Currently, the largest portion of parking on campus is 24-hour parking. If this was changed to two- or four-hour parking zones, it would allow more people access to the parking lots. This technique seems to work well enough for cities, why wouldn't it work for a university?

3) Establish a city/campus bus system. This would involve coordinating needs of merchants with the transportation needs of the University. Surely all concerned parties could reap some sort of benefit from a bus system. Merchants would have a system in place that would assist in drawing customers to their stores. People who have had trouble parking on campus or downtown would have an alternative method of transportation.

Currently, the Chamber of Commerce is looking into the possibility of establishing a trolley to serve the downtown mall. Needs of the students are being taken into consideration in regard to where the trolley routes would be laid. Although the idea of a trolley is good, it is not good enough. It suffers from the same lack of flexibility that the parking situation does. Once the tracks are laid, the routes are locked in. A trolley also involves a higher capital outlay since money has to be spent not only on the trolley cars but also on acquiring rights-of-way and on the tracks themselves.

A bus system does not have these disadvantages. Routes can be altered and coordinated with changing trends and needs in town. In addition, a bus system is more easily treated as a cooperative venture between the city and the University. Because of its flexibility, buses can go to places on campus that trolleys would not be able to go without major objections.

In these days of limited funding, ventures need to be considered that serve the largest amount of people possible in order to spread the costs around. This would be more likely to happen with a bus system.

Ultimately, the solution to the parking problem on campus requires that we discover a new standpoint for addressing the issue. No single solution will work. It is necessary to coordinate solutions together. I believe that trying to get away from the mentality of a single solution (build more parking lots) is a step in the right direction.

More space needed

Editor, Regarding the "More street signs..." article in your June 23 issue:

It really burns me up that $342,800 "generated by parking fees" by the KSU police (by repeatedly giving me and others parking tickets) is not being used to solve one of our biggest problems on campus: the lack of parking space.

Instead, it will be used for cosmetic, "fun" things like "exchanging the old parking lot identification signs for redesigned signs" and "signs with a bronze casting of K-State's official seal and engraved lettering on a smooth limestone slab" ($29,000 each).

On second thought, though, if the parking problem were solved, the police wouldn't be able to generate further revenue for fun things in the future. Would they?

Question both sides

Editor, John Exdell, writing in last Thursday's Collegian, labels Brian Jones' defense of the Nicaraguan Contras as "...a familiar series of exaggerations, half-truths and outright falsehoods..." I agree wholeheartedly. The political right-wing is too often guilty of absorbing its own propaganda.

Yet I would ask Exdell to scan the proverbial mirror. Those whose views he represents, prominent throughout the campuses of this nation, are misled by delusions of leftist infallibility.

Does anyone have a monopoly on truth? Exdell is a product of the "America the Guilty" school of history. We had slaves. We killed Indians. We built an empire on the backs of the oppressed, ad nauseam.

"The Sandinistas only want freedom," Exdell exclaims.

The sole reason that they have a Soviet-built military police state is to repel the imminent invasion of the evil Yankee and his CIA lackeys — the Contras. This is only to be expected from "the world's foremost counterrevolutionary power" — as Exdell calls the United States.

How can the United States, a country born from revolution, ever oppose a movement such as the one in Nicaragua? Is it only to ensure our hegemony over supplies of coffee and bananas?

Four revolutions have changed the world, the American (1776), the French (1789), the Russian (1917), and the Chinese Revolution of the late 1940s. Of these four breaks with the ancien regime, only the American Revolution produced a society better than the old (slavery notwithstanding).

Unlike the travesties of the other great revolutions, the American experiment did not murder and imprison opponents and intellectuals. Our government did not control the press and re-order society in the name of rationalism, relativism or Karl Marx.

America's revolution succeeded because we retained our ties to the past — liberalism, the order of law, the rights of the individual and the unity of faith.

Thus, the United States can legitimately oppose the Nicaraguan "revolution" in its current form, yet we can strive for the independence and freedom of the Nicaraguan people.

People are, at this very moment, killing and dying in Central America as well as across the globe. I am comforted that citizens like Exdell seek to explain the reasons for conflict. Nonetheless, it is important to balance the views of divergent opinions when constructing an analysis of a political problem.

Question everything, a philosopher once perceived. Question everything.

Don Holmes of Clay Center pilots his crop-dusting plane over the fields near his home. Holmes started his own crop-dusting business in Illinois in 1963, then moved to Kansas the following year. He is one of about 220 crop dusters in Kansas.

Holmes flies over his hangar. He has a complete runway at his home.

Holmes demonstrates how his single-engine, 600-horsepower Air Tractor plane sprays a field. Peak season for Holmes is between April 1 and Nov. 1, and in a good year he may spray as many as 400 farms in a 30-mile radius of Clay Center.

During the off-season, Holmes devotes time to equipment maintenance and learns new techniques and chemicals in the market. Pilots must have a commercial license verified yearly.

Crop dustin' — a way of life

It's daybreak in the alfalfa field as an alfalfa weevil yawns and reaches for its breakfast, which is more commonly used as hay and forage by area farmers.

Suddenly, the weevil pauses, cocking its head toward a faraway drone. The sound fills the morning air, growing louder and louder.

A yellow crop-dusting plane skims low over the field with a 70-foot arc of powerful insecticide trailing behind it. The weevil is about to meet its maker.

Don Holmes of Clay Center owns and operates the single-engine, 600-horsepower plane. He is one of about 220 crop dusters in Kansas and 3,000 nationwide.

Holmes said he started his own crop-dusting business in Illinois in 1963, then moved to Kansas the following summer.

Because of stringent regulations, crop dusting is not an easy field to enter, he said. Pilots must have a commercial license to fly, as verified by yearly medical exams and a flight check every two years. They must also have a license from the Federal Aviation Administration and a state license.

"The state license comes up for renewal every three years," Holmes said. "It is an extensive written test over chemicals and crops and can be critical knowledge."

For example, even from 10 feet away, alfalfa and wheat look alike between May and June, he said. Spraying the wrong pesticide beside a neighboring field can destroy a crop.

"I wouldn't advise anyone to go into this business unless he had a good agricultural background and a love of flying," he said. "Most importantly, he'd have to be persistent because it's a difficult business to get into nowadays."

In a good year, Holmes, who sprays five counties in a 30-mile radius of Clay Center, said he will cover as many as 400 farms, while in a poor one he might spray 200.

"Crop dusters are like doctors or lawyers. People come to them when they need them, but they can't just sell their services anytime."

"The economy has affected everyone. Farmers are looking for cheaper methods," said Holmes, who charges between $6 and $10 an acre for spraying. "During a bad year, I might just spray the hard-to-reach parts of a pasture, like the ditch and creek, and the farmer would hand-spray the rest for weeds and brush."

Peak dusting season for Holmes is between April 1 and Nov. 1, depending on the weather. Wind and rain generally keep the plane on the ground because visibility is critical, he said.

During the off-season, Holmes said he devotes time to equipment maintenance and learns new techniques and chemicals in the market.

"Agriculture is always changing. That's why crop dusting won't die out," he said. "For example, 20 years ago, the alfalfa weevil wasn't a problem, but today it is the most common infestation."

A crop-dusting plane is uniquely built. His Air Tractor plane has a single propeller on the nose and an air-driven pump connected to a spray boom on the back side of the wings. Fifteen nozzles on each side of the boom ensure an even spray pattern, he said.

A chemical tank sits in front of the windshield and must be refilled every one to 1½ hours. But the plane itself could go four hours without being refueled, Holmes said.

"I normally fly from daylight to 9 or 10 a.m.," Holmes said. "Then it gets too hot and windy, so I sit out until 5 p.m. I can go until dark after that."

While rewarding, crop dusting is not totally free of danger, he said. A crop-dusting pilot flies between four and 10 feet above the field at about 120 mph.

"It's mostly judgment calls and concentration," Holmes said. "A pilot has to know exactly when to pull up over a tall tree or a fence."

Engine trouble from low-altitude flying is not one of the problems pilots face because crop-dusting planes are designed for close flying, Holmes said, adding that the machine will give an indication of trouble soon enough to glide to a landing.

"The plane might get damaged, but not the pilot," he said. "The cockpit is full of support tubes. Also, I wear a helmet and harness."

While Holmes believes the chemicals are not endangering the environment, some groups have caused problems for the crop-dusting industry. The adverse publicity has raised the public's consciousness about pesticides.

"Those people are against chemicals, but they don't realize the folly of their ways," Holmes said. "American grocery stores have the finest food in the world. If chemicals are used as the label specifies, they are 100 percent safe."

"Some chemicals have been removed because of all the hullabaloo," he said. "But if you feed a mouse three truckloads of a substance, of course he's going to die."

Holmes said these groups have prompted more official supervision of chemical use.

"I am very careful about everything," he said. "When I spray a field, I always work downwind to upwind, so the risk of dissipation into neighboring towns is small."

Holmes pulls his plane out of the hangar. He usually sprays from daylight to 9 or 10 a.m. and from 5 p.m. to dark.

Holmes' Air Tractor plane flies at 120 mph and has an air-driven pump connected to a spray boom on the back side of the wings. Fifteen nozzles on each side of the boom ensure an even spray pattern.

Jeff Grayer from Iowa State University and K-Stater Steve Henson are joining eight other players, including K-State's Charles Bledsoe, to represent the Big Eight Conference as the sole U.S. team in the tournament.

Kruger sets roster for China games

By JEFF RAPP
Staff Writer

The time has come for the Big Eight basketball conference to unite and go overseas to represent its country.

This "call to arms" comes after the naming of 10 of the most appropriate and athletically talented players from the conference by K-State head basketball coach Lon Kruger and two of his assistants, Greg Gensing and Ron Stewart.

The 10 players, two of whom are K-State's Steve Henson and Charles Bledsoe, will represent the United States very well at the tournament, Stewart said.

"I think that the quality of these players, the organization that they're used to with their respective teams, the representation of the conference as well as the United States will put them to the best of their abilities. I think we'll represent the United States well against that competition," Stewart said.

The competition in the tournament, which is sponsored by the Peoples Republic of China Basketball Federation, will include teams from the Soviet Union, China, Thailand, Austria, Belgium and Japan.

The team from the Big Eight will be the sole U.S. representative, and Stewart said it might come up against some stiff competition from the host team, China.

"I would expect the Chinese to be very good, and also the Soviet Union. Even if it is a lesser team, it will still be good."

Stewart said the most difficult barrier for the Big Eight select team to overcome would be trying to better familiarize itself with international basketball rules, which will be used in the Beijing tournament.

Because teams are able to grab the ball and inbound it without a referee's approval directly after it is turned over by an opposing team, the U.S. squad will always have to be on its toes, he said.

As for the Wildcat representatives on the squad, Stewart said Henson and Bledsoe will draw dividends in their own ways from the opportunity to compete against teams from other nations.

"Steve (Henson) will benefit greatly by playing against the foreign guards," Stewart said. "The guards shoot the ball extremely well in international basketball, and it's an up-tempo game. That means he's really going to have to be alert defensively."

"Charlie (Bledsoe) will play inside for us, and hopefully we will be able to use his quickness against some of the taller, bigger guys in international ball, but it's rough and very physical in there and he'll have to get used to that," Stewart said.

The roster of the select Big Eight squad includes: Mike Sandbothe, a 6-7 junior forward from the University of Missouri; Archie Marshall, a 6-6 senior forward, and Mark Randall, a 6-9 sophomore forward from the University of Kansas; Beau Reid, a 6-7 redshirt freshman forward from the University of Nebraska; Jeff Grayer, a 6-5 senior forward, and Gary Thompkins, a 6-3 senior guard from Iowa State University; Royce Jeffries, a 6-6 sophomore forward from Oklahoma State University; and Scott Wilke, a 6-9 senior center from the University of Colorado.

Rugby 7s anticipate last chance

By The Collegian Staff

After failing to do so last weekend in Tulsa, the K-State rugby sevens squad will have one more opportunity to qualify for the national sevens championship in Milwaukee Sept. 5-6.

That opportunity will come in the form of another national qualifying meet at the University of Kansas Aug. 1-2.

Playing against an experienced field in the Tulsa tournament, K-State compiled a 2-3 record, including wins against Fort Worth, Texas, and the Houston Eliminators, and losses to the St. Louis Falcons, the Dallas Harlequins and the New Mexico Brijos.

Dave Todd, senior in mechanical engineering and center for the team, said the team represented itself admirably at the Tulsa tournament.

"These other teams play sevens all summer and this summer is the first time we have ever played the game, so I think we made a pretty good showing for ourselves for being as inexperienced in sevens as we are," Todd said.

Todd added that if the 'Cats had defeated Houston, they would have received a tournament plaque for winning their bracket.

Oklahoma's rugby football club won the tournament, thus qualifying as one of the two teams that will represent the western region in the national eight-team final tournament.

As for the Aug. 1 national qualifying tournament, Todd said it would be organized in basically the same format.

"I don't know if Oklahoma will come back and play because they don't have to, but they might play just to keep sharp," Todd said.

Tom Czapia, Manhattan, and his son, Andrew, 4, clap at the Arts in the Park puppet show Wednesday evening in City Park. The theater, which performs every Wednesday at 7 p.m., will conclude next week.

Students provide entertainment with puppet theater in City Park

By The Collegian Staff

A giraffe, wolf, parrot, toucan and many other colorful puppets entertained about 150 children and adults who gathered in City Park for Wednesday evening's puppet show.

The Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department sponsors the Manhattan Puppet Theatre, which performs every Wednesday at 7 p.m. as part of the Arts in the Park series.

The theater began six years ago as Park Puppets and Players, said Kathie Church who co-directs the theatre this summer with her sister, Karen.

"It's not formal. The theater is still evolving, so there are no set rules. We try to get someone involved who has worked with the puppets in previous summers," Kathie said.

Mark Barnett, professor of psychology, brought his two children, Megan, 6, and Neil, 4.

"We've been coming to the puppet shows since Megan was one-and-a-half years old," Barnett said. "The kids think it's great, and they know all the puppeteers. It's a good social function for kids."

From an opening skit with a colorful troll to a number featuring white-sheeted ghosts with a pink-eared elephant, a puppy dog and a pig as ghostbusters to the rousing song "Purple People Eater" with a one-eyed, one-horned, flying purple-people eater, it was an entertainment-packed half hour.

Denise Brown brought her 18-month-old son Cody to see the puppets for the first time.

"It's very fulfilling for him to see a wide variety of activities," Brown said. "He enjoys the Muppets (on television), but he has never been to a live puppet show."

There are 12 people on the staff, including the two directors. Most of the staff are in junior high or high school.

Theater company to present productions on K-State stage

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

Three women travel through space and time, a young couple face the tragedy of unrequited love and a man searches for love and happiness.

These are all subjects to be presented in the upcoming 1987-88 K-State Players' season in Nichols Theater and McCain Auditorium.

"K-State Players is a group of people, students and faculty that are a (theater) producing organization," said Janet Treiber, senior in theater and a member of the group.

The K-State Players were incorporated in 1945. At that time, sponsorship for productions went from the hands of the Manhattan Civic Theater to the University, said Rhonda Miracle, instructor of speech and publicity and box office coordinator for the group.

An extension of the Department of Speech, the K-State Players basically is concerned with theater productions, Miracle said. The group is funded through the speech department, Student Governing Association and ticket sales.

"K-State Players is an organization that anyone can be involved with," said Jennifer Hays, senior in theater and president of the group. "Working on any show in any capacity is all it takes."

The season consists of six performances. Four of the six productions are scheduled for Nichols Theater: "On the Verge" by Eric Overmyer, "The Real Thing" by Tom Stoppard, "To Gillian, on Her 37th Birthday" by Michael Brady and "Romeo and Juliet" by William Shakespeare.

The season's two musical productions are scheduled for McCain Auditorium. "South Pacific" by Rogers and Hammerstein will be presented Oct. 22, 23 and 24.

The opera slot will be filled by two one-act operas. The first opera is Leonard Bernstein's "Trouble in Tahiti." Written in the 1950s, this comical opera has a jazzy rhythm and tempo, Miracle said.

Maurice Ravel wrote "The Spanish Hour" during the 18th century. The story of a flighty wife and an absent-minded clockmaker, the opera is slapstick yet traditional.

"Students and the audience are going to be exposed to a varied season," Miracle said. "Students are going to be exposed to many challenges, and the audience will see a lovely variety."

The season will open with "On the Verge." Directed by Kate Anderson, associate professor of speech, this contemporary piece deals with three Victorian women explorers who travel through space and time.

"The Real Thing," directed by Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech, follows a man as he seeks to find love and happiness. The play begins with the end of a marriage, develops with a courtship and ends with a marriage.

"To Gillian, on Her 37th Birthday" is about a father and daughter coming to terms with the loss of a family member. They take the fond memories of the woman who was both a wife and mother and attempt to go forward.

"This show deals with people," Miracle said. "One moment you're laughing, and the next moment you are really quiet."

The K-State Players' season will conclude with "Romeo and Juliet," directed by Charlotte MacFarland, instructor in speech. A tragedy, this play is about the intense hatred of two Venician families and the unrequited love of their children.

All K-State Players' productions begin at 8 p.m. Season tickets will be available the end of August at the Nichols box office. Student and senior citizen discounts are available. Box office hours are noon to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Auditions for fall semester shows will be Aug. 24, 25 and 26 in Nichols Hall.

"Come to Nichols Hall the first few days of class, and there should be signs up all over," Hays said. "Students can audition for as many roles or as few as they want."

Video tape collection at library

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

"Star Wars," "The Big Chill," "The Philadelphia Story" and "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea" are now playing at the Manhattan Public Library.

Beginning June 1, the library followed the lead of other libraries throughout Kansas and added a new video tape collection to its holdings, said Linda Scott, collection development librarian.

"The tapes are an additional non-book form of information," she said.

Prior to deciding on the new collection, the library surveyed more than 600 library patrons, the majority of whom showed a strong interest in a video tape collection, Scott said.

The library has 218 video tapes. Rather than selecting popular current releases, the library has sought critically acclaimed films, Scott said. Fifty percent of the collection are feature films.

"We have a pretty varied collection," she said. "We have every Academy Award-winning film from 1928 to 1986 that is available on video tape."

In addition to feature films, the library has a selection of five different categories from which to choose. Children's films, which include educational as well as entertaining selections, make up 30 percent of the video collection.

"We are trying to stay away from the Saturday morning cartoons," Scott said.

The remainder of the collection is made up of foreign films, educational and documentary films, instructional tapes and performances, she said.

Scott said some of the instructional tapes include how-to tapes made by cooperative extension agents at K-State. These tapes range from gardening to knitting.

"We want to build a collection that is of use to the community," Scott said. "We want to provide films that they can't find as readily at a video store."

The video tapes are located in the library's reading room. Subject and title indexes are available, or patrons can browse through the film boxes.

Video tapes may be checked out at the circulation desk with a current public library card, Scott said. The tapes are checked out for three days at a time with a $1 fee.

"We have to charge the fee in order to sustain the collection," she said.

The library has established a $3-per-day-per-item late fee. A $2 fee is charged if the tape is returned without the case.

To apply for a library card at the Manhattan Public Library, a patron must bring in two forms of identification. A photo ID and an additional ID with a current address is required.

Video tapes may be checked out during the library's working hours. The library is open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. on weekdays, 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and 2 p.m. to 6 p.m. Sunday.

Manhattan group wins music contest

A full house is exactly what Full House, a band from Manhattan, played to at the KTKP Country Radio Sixth Annual True Value Country Showdown Monday evening.

The local band took home first-place honors in the country music contest.

Matt Bunker, graduate student in journalism and mass communications and Full House guitarist, said that was just the kind of crowd for which his band likes to play.

About 450 people gathered in the Grand Ballroom of the Downtown Ramada Inn in Topeka to hear the 12 finalists in the local competition, said Marlena Adkison, KTKP contest coordinator and operations manager.

The band — composed of Bunker, his wife Lois Graham, who plays the keyboard and sings, drummer Pete Dejanovich and new guitarist John Payne — has been playing in the Manhattan-Junction City area since January, Bunker said.

Full House will represent KTKP at the contest's state competition in Wichita Aug. 29, Adkison said.

The winner of the state competition will represent Kansas at the national finals to be broadcast on The Nashville Network in December. The winner will also receive $50,000, a one-year recording contract and a one-year booking contract.

Originally hearing about the contest from Sweethearts of the Rodeo, the 1985 national contest winner, Bunker and his band entered the local preliminaries held in early June at The Ranch Saloon in Manhattan.

They were among four bands and eight soloists selected to perform at the KTKP finals, Adkison said.

"It was a chance to get exposure around the area," Bunker said. "It keeps our name known to people."

"We've been in these (contests) before, and it's nerve-racking. But this one was a lot of fun."

The band was not expecting to win, Bunker said, but stranger things have happened.

Several years ago, Bunker also entered and won the Kentucky Fried Chicken song-writing contest. From more than 40,000 entries from across the United States, his song "Another Day, Another Dollar" was selected to be recorded by country singer Johnny Lee.

Each of the 12 KTKP contest finalists were allowed to perform original or previously recorded music for seven minutes, Adkison said.

Full House performed "Another Day, Another Dollar" and "Rodeo Rider," both of which were written by Bunker.

"I think it helps a little in competition if your music is original," Bunker said. "We also felt like we had to have a lot of energy and lively things up. We (the band and audience) try to interact with each other."

Bunker said he does not even notice the size of the crowds anymore.

"It's like being in my own living room," he said.

Both graduates of K-State, Bunker and Graham, a graduate student in music, have been playing in bands together since 1977. Following college, they traveled to California to play with bands in the Los Angeles area.

"We played in the L.A. area for about two years," Bunker said. "It is a music mecca where a lot of good musicians are located."

Bunker said they were able to learn much about the music business.

"Not a typical country band, we try to be able to do just about anything — country, '50s and '60s and some of the newer music," he said. "We just try to be very versatile."

The market in this area is not large enough to specialize in any one type of music, Bunker said.

Before playing, the band establishes the type of music to be played, size of crowd and length of time, he said.

"We play at clubs, parties and fraternal orders such as the Elks and Eagles," Bunker said. "What we play depends on whom we are playing for."

Besides working with other musicians while in California, Graham began to produce and arrange demos, he said.

"We (Bunker and Graham) are in the stages of putting together a demo service in this area," Bunker said. "We will probably use a studio in Topeka for the recording."

The service would include finding the musicians, helping with the arrangements and providing a studio for people interested in recording a demo, he said.

Movie not 'vintage' Brooks work

By ANDRE KELLY
Collegian Reviewer

After more than a year of stellar hype and unashamed plugging, the cosmic spoof "Spaceballs" has finally landed.

Film Review

If you've seen the "Star Wars" trilogy, then you already know half of the story. Mel Brooks, like some mad chef, has taken ingredients from all kinds of tales ("Aliens," "Transformers," "Star Trek," "Max Headroom"), thrown them together and comes up with a zany interstellar stew.

Brooks also plays dual roles as the omniscient Yogurt and the evil President Skroob. Rick Moranis is the villainous Dark Helmet and together, they're out to steal the atmosphere from the Planet of Druidia. To make this easier, they kidnap Princess Vespa (Daphne Zuniga) and her droid sidekick Dot Matrix (Joan Rivers.)

However, the evil-doers are thwarted by the slimy mercenary Lone Starr (Bill Pullman) and his generic Wookiee sidekick Barf (John Candy). From there, the chase begins and the film grinds to a trot.

The four renegades meet up with Yogurt, and he empowers them with the secret of the "schwarz." It's here that the tale begins to resemble "The Wizard of Oz." This time, the one in need of a heart is Lone Starr, the seeker of knowledge is Dot, the coward is clearly Barf and the one in need of brains (and talent) is Princess Vespa. Competition-wise, it's doubtful that Vanna White is losing any sleep over her.

When Dark Helmet finally confronts his adversaries and tells them that, "Evil will always triumph over good because good is dumb," he definitely is trying to tell us something.

As if the acting isn't bad enough, some the stunts are even worse. When Lone Starr and Barf decide to "jam" the scanners of their enemies, the next shot (you guessed it) is a satellite dish being hit with a jar of Smuckers. Contrary to critics' ravings, this is not vintage Mel Brooks.

The problem with "Spaceballs" is that it simply tries to bite off way more than it can chew. It mixes too many genres, gags and characters with too little story. Special effects aside, the acting is horrendous, the writing is dreadful and the pace, especially for a comedy, is agonizingly slow. Instead of the space-epic Brooks promises, it ends up being a blatant, unoriginal, excruciatingly long commercial.

The real tragedy is that many critics are comparing this film to "Blazing Saddles" (which yuk-wise is light years funnier), the huge difference being that the western was on the money while "Spaceballs" is merely after it.

Brother's new owners plan reopening

By JOLA MURPHY
City Editor

The tradition continues. Fans of Brother's Tavern can breathe a sigh of relief. The popular, but controversial bar will open its doors once again after being closed since July 1.

After surrendering their cereal malt beverage license to the city, former owners Kevin Ladd and Max Strunk began purchase negotiations with several possible buyers. On Tuesday, Ladd and Strunk sold the tavern to Rex Woodell, previous owner of Southern Sun Tanning Center, and Jim Wright, former employee of Pizza Hut Inc. in Topeka.

Wright and Woodell were college roommates and had considered the possibility of owning their own drinking establishment for several years.

"We basically developed the dream of opening a bar together when we were in college," Wright said. "We saw this opportunity, and we decided this was a good time to do it. Brother's has a lot of tradition."

Wright and Woodell said the atmosphere of the bar will not change, and the type of music and bands will be the same as those that have previously appeared on the Brother's stage.

The new owners also said the purchase of the bar included all the special signs and memorabilia left by the previous owners.

"We are keeping all the little stuff that makes this place Brother's," Woodell said. "We plan on keeping the same format. We just stepped in and took over the operation, and we don't plan on changing anything."

Ladd and Strunk lost their license due to several overcrowding violations in the past year, and were forced to close the bar.

"Kevin and Max have helped us a lot," Woodell said. "They had a lot of good ideas for the future that we will probably use. We're confident in making it a fun, successful bar just like they did."

Wright and Woodell said they plan to cooperate with the city in watching closely for overcrowding and serving beer to minors. The underage customers will be stamped to indicate they can be admitted but cannot purchase beer.

"It will be the same crazy atmosphere," Woodell said. "We want people to feel like they can have a good time and get rowdy while they're here."

Instructors teach methods in China

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

Two K-State professors of grain science have returned from a trip to Wuhan, China, where they helped conduct a series teaching the best ways to raise livestock for consumption.

Associate Professor Keith Behnke and Professor Robert McElhiney were invited by the China Cereals and Oils Association, along with Herb Knip, plant manager for Kent Feeds in Rockford, Ill., to participate in the seminar held June 9-14.

"(The Chinese) have a strong desire to improve the protein intake of the people," Behnke said. "They have a very low-fat diet and consume much less meat than Europe or the U.S. The government wants to improve protein intake, and it takes animal protein to do that."

"The U.S. will now have to export more feed grains and vegetable proteins such as soybean meal and other proteins for the animals to consume. China has been a very good international customer to the U.S. and will continue to do so."

About 110 people associated with trade institutions and various universities from provinces in China attended. Other participants were from government institutions and various feed companies.

The seminar was the idea of McElhiney when he visited China about three years ago, Behnke said. Plans were made, then McElhiney sent his resume along with Behnke's and Knip's for the Chinese government to consider the idea.

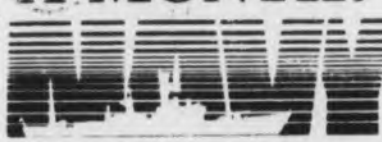

"I think there will be a lot more opportunity to go into China and do more of these short courses," Behnke said.

The course covered an array of factors controlling the quality of production, such as receiving the raw ingredients or grain, and ingredient quality. The second part dealt with grinding and processing the grain and the effect of particle size on animals. Mixing, testing and selecting the feed ingredients was covered in the third section, and the remainder of the course dealt with mill design, packaging and warehousing and plant-management concepts.

McElhiney's trip was funded entirely by the China Cereals and Oils Association. Behnke's trip was funded partly through the International Grains Program at K-State and partly by personal funds.

"It was a very rare opportunity to go to China, so it was hard for any of us to pass up," Behnke said.

Miss Rodeo to promote sport in area

By RHODA REIN
Collegian Reporter

Pageant winners are usually expected to promote some ideal or organization. Janette Poole, junior in agricultural journalism, plans to promote the sport of rodeo.

"As Miss Rodeo K-State, I want to promote rodeo throughout the University and the community to make others realize that rodeo, a nationally regulated sport, is as important as any other collegiate sport K-State participates in," Poole said. Poole has returned from the Miss College Rodeo contest held in conjunction with the College National Finals Rodeo in Bozeman, Mont.

Her first step toward achieving the crown of Miss Rodeo K-State was winning the school pageant in April, held near the time of the annual K-State intercollegiate rodeo. The pageant had similar qualifications to the Miss College Rodeo contest.

"Rodeo queen contestants give a speech, answer impromptu questions, model a western wardrobe and ride horses in specific patterns," Poole said. "They are also interviewed on their fashion and rodeo knowledge."

Judges award points to each contestant based on her performance in each category. Points in each of three equal divisions — horsemanship, personality and appearance — are totaled to find the overall winner and also winners of the horsemanship and appearance categories.

"In all situations you are judged on your integrity, your ability to think spontaneously," Poole said.

Poole said she was crowned at the Rodeo Club awards banquet at the end of April, and for the next seven weeks she prepared for the Miss College Rodeo contest.

"One of the first things I did to prepare was to send my contest application, a press release and pictures to Joan Cook, the national pageant director," Poole said. "From then on I prepared my speech, wardrobe and travel arrangements."

Traveling far to compete in a national contest is expensive, so Poole recruited some financial as well as emotional support.

"I got S-J western store (S Bar J

Western Clothiers) and a local family to help somewhat with my expenses," she said. "The emotional support I got from my friends, family, employer and the K-State Rodeo Club was tremendous."

During the week-long contest, Poole helped usher and worked in the press booth during the nightly rodeo performances.

"Your ability to communicate with the public via ushering and signing autographs is judged, as well," she said.

"The hardest part of the Miss College Rodeo contest for me was the horsemanship division," Poole said.

A written test is given on the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association, the governing body of college rodeo competition.

"It was a little bit of a surprise when I got up there," Poole said. "Some of the girls and I got together and studied pretty hard for it during our free time."

"In one part of the test, we had to match schools with their corresponding regions." There are 11 regions in the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association.

Working at S Bar J Western Clothiers, Manhattan, helped Poole to prepare her wardrobe.

"I knew what was available. I have watched the western style trends for the past three years," she said. "One-third of the contest judging is based on appearance, so you should plan ahead what you will wear for every event."

Poole said as Miss Rodeo K-State she will continue to work as a liaison between rodeo competitors and the public.

The week before leaving for Bozeman, Poole rode in Manhattan's Fun Festival parade and plans to continue her reign by riding in the Kaw Valley rodeo and parade at CiCo Park the last weekend in July. Another appearance will be at the K-State new-faculty barbecue at the beginning of the fall semester.

This summer Poole plans to enter the Miss Rodeo Kansas pageant held during the Dodge City Days rodeo. The winner of the Miss Rodeo Kansas pageant will go on to Las Vegas for the Miss Rodeo America pageant held in conjunction with the National Finals Rodeo.

than what they are told," he said.

In order to maintain a fair procedure in the checks-and-balances system of U.S. politics, Arck said the citizens should know what their government is doing. But officials are the ones who should definitely know what is going on because they are elected to make the decisions for the public.

In order to improve the system, Arck said "the security (of classified information) has to be guaranteed and safeguarded," to avoid major leaks of information that can hurt national interest and security.

Arck said that judgment of the Iran-Contra Hearings cannot be made from Manhattan.

"To be able to adequately judge North or the president can't be done from Manhattan, Kan., because you don't have access to all the information needed to make an informed decision," he said.

"It is much easier to make a decision regarding national and international interests when you have all of the facts."

"None of the state schools ever gave anything like that, not even independent colleges," Bradfield said.

Everything possible has been done in the past year to show in-state students what K-State offers, said Maribeth Gottschalk, K-State admissions representative.

"I can't believe students are feeling neglected by Kansas schools, when I think back to the work (the admissions representatives) have done, along with the president and the vice-presidents, just to interest them in K-State."

"I'd like to know what we're doing wrong if these students feel neglected."

Gottschalk said K-State automatically offers a $2,000 scholarship to all National Merit finalists and semi-finalists — a number that totaled 161 students this year — regardless of financial need.

The students also said they and their friends were able to get personal attention from Kansas universities, but usually because of an extra-curricular activity or a personal contact.

"The scholarship comes when you have one person pushing it through," said Carl Gerriets, of Emporia, who plans to attend Emporia State University.

Tallman said students may not receive information about the state schools early enough in their decision-making process, leading to a feeling of impersonal treatment. The state needs to develop a cooperative recruiting effort.

"ASK has convinced the legislature to fund a newsletter project," Tallman said. "The Board of Regents has been given $20,000 to publish a newsletter containing general information about all the state institutions in Kansas, which will be sent to high school juniors and seniors."

Finally, the students said Kansas colleges must sometimes compete with the mystique and reputation of prestigious universities elsewhere, especially in the East.

"I think all high-school students have a misconception that there won't be anything of value for them in Kansas," Gottschalk said.

art, drama, science and computers as well as individual sports. Each class is one hour long.

"We want to keep the kids active in class but we don't want to burn them out by spending too much time in one area," Langton said.

"Kids who attend the program all summer will receive the same kinds of classes offered but will not repeat any of them exactly as they were presented the previous two weeks," Butler said.

The children attending the program all day are taken to lunch in the K-State Union.

"The group leaders, who are students here at the University, supervise the kids while they eat lunch in the Union. The kids are allowed $2.25 for a balanced lunch," Butler said. "Not only are they learning how to choose well-balanced meals for themselves but they are also learning how to keep their meal in their given budget."

After lunch more enrichment classes are held as well as individual sports.

From 3:30 to 5:00 p.m., it is extravaganza time.

"This is (the) time when the kids are either taken to different departments on campus or people come in and present programs," Langton said.

"One day, the kids toured the psychology department and were shown how different experiments are done. Other things they have enjoyed have been a tour of the Collegian, touring the vet med complex, Lafene (Student Health Center) and the physics department," Langton said.

on North alone.

"North committed a lot of mistakes," Korosh said. "If he truly believed in freedom and democracy, as he claims he does, then he shouldn't have sold arms to the Iranians who are known to be anti-democratic and against human rights."

"I believe it is hypocritical when it is said that the United States financed so-called freedom fighters in Central America or Nicaragua by selling armament to the Iranian government because this government doesn't believe in values of freedom and democracy."

Itzhak Ben-Itzhak, research associate in physics, said there are flaws in the American democratic system.

"The Iran-Contra hearing has North as a good witness (but) the system is more to be blamed than North because the problem stemming from the executive branch of the American democratic system, which regards politics and foreign policy, considers matters of convenience more heavily than the moral aspect," Ben-Itzhak said.

One example Ben-Itzhak gave was breaking the law or supporting a dictatorship like Somoza's.

Ben-Itzhak also said he believes "North is breaking the law (far) less than when the CIA went to Chile killing president Allende."

"Because Reagan supports the contras," Nicolaidis said, "the administration should first decide whether they will support the contras or not, then they can talk about justifying North or not."

Official suggests pre-enrollment drug testing

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — After hearing a report on successful drug testing programs for Kansas college athletes, a top official of the Kansas Board of Regents suggested similar results could be obtained if all students were required to submit proof that they are drug free.

Stanley Z. Koplik, executive director of the Board of Regents, said in addition to a current requirement that incoming freshmen furnish a copy of their high school records, they also could be forced to go to their family doctors for pre-enrollment drug tests.

The doctors would then provide documentation that prospective students had tested negative for drugs, Koplik said. With that arrangement, the state would not have to foot the bill for the tests, he said.

"I'm saying that we could move in that kind of direction," Koplik told the Governor's Task Force on Drug Awareness. He did not say what might happen to students who tested positive for drugs.

Afterward, Koplik said he had not put the sweeping drug test plan forward as a serious proposal but mentioned it briefly only as "a natural outcropping of the discussion."

"I was sort of thinking aloud," he said.

Koplik made the comments after athletic directors from five of the six state universities said drug testing programs have had a deterrent effect on athletes.

The five-member task force is scheduled to meet this summer to develop recommendations for the Board of Regents by this fall on ways to fight drug and alcohol abuse on campus.

Gary Hunter, associate athletics director at the University of Kansas, said KU administers between 1,300 and 1,500 drug tests each year to about 400 student athletes and less than 2 percent have tested positive.

Nearly identical results were reported at Kansas State University, where Athletic Director Larry Travis said about 350 athletes are tested annually. Travis contended the tests have discouraged drug use among athletes at K-State.

However, athletic directors from the three smaller regional universities complained that funds for drug tests at their institutions have had to come from other programs.

"I'm imposing on time and I'm imposing on resources, and I'm still expected to deliver a quality program," said Bill Quayle, athletic director at Emporia State University.

Quayle said about 10 percent of ESU's athletes will be tested as part of a program that will be instituted there next year. Officials will treat

The University now has three black faculty with the hiring of an instructor in the College of Architecture and Design.

However, LaBarbara J. Wigfall, who was hired last week in the Department of Environmental Design, was not hired in the wake of concern about low minority representation at the University, said Rick Forsythe, associate dean of the college.

The college "has been trying to attract Wigfall for some time," he said. "She was hired because of her background and experience."

Forsythe said Wigfall has lectured at K-State before and has kept in contact with the college for the past two years.

"The breadth and diverse nature of LaBarbara's academic and professional background together with her talents in planning and design will greatly enhance the students' educational experience as well as a number of important areas of emphasis," he said.

Jane Rowlett, director of the Affirmative Action office, said the University was "pleased to have hired Wigfall because of her credentials," and that she was not hired simply because she is a minority.

"She was hired because she can make a contribution because of her background and qualifications," Rowlett said.

Recently, concerns have been raised about a low minority representation in the University's faculty. Phillip Royster, a black faculty member in the Department of English, left K-State for a position at Bowling Green State University, Bowling Green, Ohio, and a 42 percent increase in salary. The remaining black faculty on campus are James Boyer, professor of curriculum and instruction, and William Sutton, professor of biology.

"Money is the No. 1 reason we cannot attract more minority applicants to the University," Rowlett said. "But the administration is making every effort to intensify the search process."

Rowlett said faculty are hired first and foremost "because they are good."

"We also hope to add to the representation among minority groups, enrich the environment and add diversity to the faculty members," Rowlett said. "In educational environments diversity is prized."

"Design and planning professions have worked hard to develop minority programs to increase numbers of minorities in professions," Forsythe said. "We see this as an important way to attract interested minority

Blue Key asks main office for constitutional revisions

By MICHAEL MORRIS
Staff Writer

After deciding to suspend pledges of God and country in its constitution on May 4, the campus chapter of the Blue Key is waiting to see if the national chapter will follow suit.

Kelly Welch, former president of the K-State's Blue Key chapter and a 1987 graduate in agricultural economics, said the changes were made because state policy prohibits such references within state-operated institutions.

"In our constitution there is a pledge that every member has to take, and within that pledge is 'I believe in God,' and that's against state policy," Welch said, "and the University is a state school, and we are an University organization."

Also being recommended for change is a reference affirming that all members support and defend the government of the United States.

"In one place in the constitution it says, 'I will defend the government,' and that could be interpreted to mean the government currently in power," he said. "We have proposed changes that any references to government be eliminated and (U.S.) Constitution be stated in its place."

Welch said the chapter did not think such references should be included since the organization was formed to serve the University.

Although the K-State chapter has already eliminated these clauses from its constitution, the recommendations must be approved nationally by all Blue Key chapters.

"Our chapter has suspended the pledge for our purposes," Welch said. "We do not follow it, we do not observe it, and that will be the case until the changes are passed."

Welch said the changes will take time to be approved or disapproved. The process involves ballots mailed to each of the Blue Key chapters and then a vote during the national convention in 1988.

"One will be proposed by mail ballot, and that will be the acclamation of God in the pledge," he said. "The other will be voted on during the convention."

If the chapters decide to keep the old constitution, the K-State chapter will not renew the pledges and will keep the changes.

Welch said other Blue Key chapters may operate their chapters based on religion and government, and resistance may be met to approve the changes.

U.S.-defended Kuwaiti tankers sail past Iran's gunboats without clash

By The Associated Press

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates — Two Kuwaiti tankers sailed swiftly up the Persian Gulf on Wednesday, escorted by U.S. jet fighters and Navy warships on high alert for Iran's high-speed gunboats and helicopters.

Iran has vowed to strike the convoy, take American sailors prisoner and burn the Stars and Stripes flying on the funnels of the reflagged Kuwaiti tankers if any of its ships are attacked.

The supertanker Bridgeton and the smaller oil products carrier Gas Prince were surrounded by three and at times five U.S. warships as they passed within range of an Iranian missile battery in the Strait of Hormuz, considered the most perilous part of their three-day, 500-mile journey to Kuwait.

Overhead, aircraft from the carrier USS Constellation stationed outside the gulf flew a rotating air cover.

In Washington, the Pentagon said the Navy had not detected any move by Iran to ready any of its Chinese-made Silkworm anti-ship missiles and that the ships were out of range after the convoy cleared the strait. "So in reality, the ships are already safely through the passage and on their way to Kuwait," one official added.

By midafternoon, they had passed within 12 miles of Abu Musa, an Iranian island used by Revolutionary Guards, fanatical followers of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, to launch gunboat and helicopter attacks on commercial shipping.

As night fell on the gulf, the convoy cruised past the long shoreline of the United Arab Emirates and the port of Dubai.

"They are moving fast in close convoy," reported one shipping source as the cluster of ships traveled through the strait at about 16 knots, the approximate top speed of the 401,382-ton Bridgeton.

Capt. David P. Yonkers, who commands the Navy escort dubbed "Operation Earnest Will," said the U.S. ships would come no closer than one or two miles to the "exclusion zone" declared by Iran along its side of the gulf.

"Remember, this is the real thing — this is not a drill," Capt. William W. Mathis told the 476-member crew aboard the Navy cruiser USS Fox before it entered the Strait of Hormuz.

Both the Bridgeton, formerly the Al-Rekkah, and the 46,723-ton Gas Prince, formerly the Al-Minagish, ran up the American flag Tuesday off the United Arab Emirates. The ships, with American captains, left the United Arab Emirates port of Khor Fakkan on Wednesday morning for Kuwait's Al-Ahmadi oil terminal.

The Fox led the convoy, while the frigate Crommelin and the destroyer Kidd steamed nearby. An Associated Press reporter who was part of a Pentagon media pool on the Kidd said the convoy maintained a condition just below General Quarters, the Surrounding businesses lenient on initial parking offenses

By LINDA BRAUN

Businesses bordering campus usually give students or K-State visitors parking in their lots a break for their first offense before having their cars towed.

Dan Richards, general manager of University Inn, said first-time offenders are usually let off the hook.

"We are very generous in giving out warnings," he said. "But if the car is found repeatedly in our lot, we'll tow the car."

Richards has the parking lot monitored on a full-time basis during the first three weeks of each semester, then one or two days a week the rest of the semester.

"During the beginning of the semester we are at our peak in business, and at the same time the students are trying to find a safe place to park for the rest of the semester," he said. "Usually if we catch the majority of them early in the semester, there isn't a problem."

Richards said he is willing to work with students and K-State visitors on their quests for parking off-campus as long as the hotel's business is not affected.

"Students have the misconception that since the University is now associated with the hotel, they can park here," he said. "We lease the land here, so the parking rights belong to the (KSU) Foundation, not the college."

Richards said he was lenient to students who let him know it's a one-time occurrence, and he has allowed faculty members to rent space on a semester basis.

The inn practices a variety of parking control measures, including written warnings and confrontations. On occasion a tow truck is parked in front of the hotel to serve as a watchdog.

Richards said that worked both as an illegal parking deterrent and as entertainment for the employees.

"We sat inside and watched students pull in, see the tow truck and leave," he said.

Richards is currently not asking guests to display parking permits because the inn hosts a lot of local conventions and does a lot of restaurant business. However, he said this makes it harder to distinguish between patrons' and students' vehicles.

Other campus-bordering businesses do not have as much trouble distinguishing between the two said, Diane Nordhus, Shop Quik store No. 1 manager, and Louie Ruiz, 7-11 manager.

"Because we're in the convenience business, customers are in and out of here quickly," Nordhus said. "The employees time cars that are in our lot and have them towed if they are here for over an hour."

Nordhus and Ruiz both said they have granted students a one-time parking spot provided they ask first.

All three businesses have signs posted warning violators of consequences and hand out written warnings for first offenders.

Gorbachev offers nuclear arms deal

MOSCOW — Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev said the Kremlin is ready to eliminate its medium- and shorter-range missiles in Asia if the United States does not insist on stationing 100 mid-range warheads in Alaska, Tass said Wednesday.

Tass, the official Soviet news agency, said the Soviet leader made the remarks in written replies to questions from the Indonesian newspaper Merdeka.

Arms reductions talks between the superpowers have been deadlocked for weeks. The two sides are negotiating a ban on medium-range and shorter-range missiles in Europe.

One of the potential obstacles has been U.S. insistence on the right to deploy 100 warheads with a 600-to-1,500-mile range in Alaska, across the Bering Strait from the Soviet Union.

Those would balance 100 medium-range warheads with a similar range that President Reagan agreed the Soviets could keep, at least for the time being, in Soviet Asia.

However, Gorbachev indicated in his reply to Merdeka that the Soviet Union was ready to scrap its SS-20 rockets in Asia, each of which can carry three nuclear warheads.

The Asian weapons can be easily transported and sent to sites within range of China and Japan.

The Soviets have about 140 of those missile launchers overall. About one-third are in East Germany and Czechoslovakia, another third in Soviet Europe and the final third in Soviet Asia.

Authorities bury massacre victims

MAPUTO, Mozambique — The government said Wednesday it had buried most of the 380 people reported killed in a rebel massacre, and the official news agency released grisly photographs of bodies.

AIM, the news agency, said the pictures were taken by a cotton mill worker on Sunday, a day after the massacre in Homoine, 300 miles north of Maputo. It did not identify the mill worker.

One photograph was of bodies stacked on a wagon. Another depicted a woman wearing hospital clothing and wrapped in a blanket. A third showed a man's body next to that of a child whose head had been crushed.

The Marxist government blamed the Mozambique National Resistance. The guerrilla group has been fighting since 1977, two years after independence from Portugal, and began attacking civilians in 1982.

Lawyer to refute testimony motion

QUANTICO, Va. — The first day of the sex-for-secrets court-martial of a former Moscow Embassy guard ended Wednesday with a defense lawyer saying he will fight prosecution plans to have an unidentified witness testify.

William Kunstler, who is heading the defense of Clayton Lonetree, said he would challenge a motion to the Military Court of Appeals allowing prosecutors to use the witness.

"That has never happened in the history of the country," Kunstler said after the court-martial adjourned for the day. Asked if the unidentified witness was a CIA agent, Kunstler said, "Who knows?"

Kunstler has said the CIA tried to persuade Lonetree, a Marine sergeant, that he was being recruited as a double agent and deceived him into talking to them during an investigation of embassy security.

Most of the opening day's proceedings, including arguments about the witness, were conducted behind closed doors because they involved classified material. The court-martial resumes Thursday.

The military trial began with Kunstler asking about possible prejudice against his client.

Senate continues debate over Bork

WASHINGTON — The Senate is evenly divided over whether to confirm President Reagan's nomination of Robert H. Bork to the Supreme Court, a Democratic Senate leader said Wednesday.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Whip Alan Cranston, D-Calif., said Cranston has counted 45 Senators who oppose the nomination or are leaning against it, 45 who support it or are inclined in favor, and 10 who are undecided.

The spokesman, Murray Flander, said Cranston's head count is based on conversations with Senators and his knowledge of how some of them are likely to vote.

"He knows from 19 years experience who is virtually certain to go one way or the other," Flander said. He said Cranston has not conducted any formal poll.

Dale Tait, a spokeswoman for Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said Cranston's figures "sound fairly accurate."

She said, "We all knew it was going to be close. You can't get much closer than that."

Bork, a conservative federal appeals court judge, was nominated by Reagan on July 1 to replace retired Supreme Court Justice Lewis F. Powell.

The choice has generated a great deal of controversy with conservative and liberal groups mounting expensive lobbying campaigns for and against the nomination.

Contras intensify war in Nicaragua

WASHINGTON — U.S.-backed Contra rebels have been averaging three attacks a day on Nicaragua's transportation network recently as part of a sizable expansion in their war on the leftist Sandinista government, an American military official said Wednesday.

Since $100 million in U.S. assistance to the Contras began flowing last fall, there have been increasing signs of demoralization of the Sandinista Army, reflected in a desertion rate of 10 to 15 percent, the official said.

The Sandinistas also are suffering from an acute oil shortage and at least six government military aircraft have been shot down by the Contras since the first of the year, the official said. He added that some Sandinista units are suffering from a typhoid epidemic.

Court to employ collection agency

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Municipal Court officials have come up with a new twist in their effort to collect an estimated $2 million in unpaid traffic fines.

Court officials have hired a collection agency to pursue outstanding fines — and the agency has the added leverage of giving delinquent ticket payers a bad credit rating.

"If you owe us $70, it should be like owing Sears $70. Now if you don't pay, it'll come back to get you," said John Franklin, the court administrator.

General Account Service Inc. of North Kansas City was hired to begin collecting on the growing number of outstanding tickets — about 70,000 of them in the past five years. About 90 percent of the tickets are for traffic violations — including parking tickets — and the remainder are for other ordinance violations, such as trespassing or minor assaults.

The agency will receive 18 percent of the fines it collects as its fee.

Bill Bland, the agency's president, said delinquent ticket payers will be reported to two area credit bureaus. And that could be a problem for people seeking loans for homes or cars, he said.

High school actors sample college life

By ANNJELA HYNES
Collegian Reporter

The Division of Continuing Education collaborates with other departments to offer Kansas high school students and teachers a taste of college life through week-long workshops.

One program coordinated by continuing education and the Department of Speech was a summer theater workshop designed to sharpen acting and directing skills.

Six high school students and four high school teachers participated in the workshop July 12-18.

The theater workshop is one of about 25 summer high-school programs coordinated by continuing education, although some were cancelled because of a lack of enrollment, said Susan Jackson, coordinator of summer high school programs.

Linda Haynes Uthoff, assistant director for the theater workshop, said the number of enrollees was "about average" and that the small workshop allows instructors to do more work with individuals.

The idea behind the programs, Jackson said, "is to combine the academic work with the residence hall environment to give students a taste of college life."

Students were housed in Goodnow Hall and ate meals in Kramer Food Center.

Robert Richter, senior at Manhattan High School, said everyone "got along really well...we became very good friends because it was such a small group."

In conjunction with continuing education, the speech department mailed brochures with information about the workshop to Kansas high schools in the spring. Any student who was interested could apply, and participants were chosen on a first-come, first-served basis, Uthoff said.

Scholarships ranging from $25 to $80 were also offered to students who had done theater work in high school, she said. Other departments used the same procedures in sponsoring workshops.

The scholarship money was offered to help pay for the cost of attending the workshop, which included the students' living expenses and Summer Repertory Theatre tickets.

The theater workshop focused on acting and directing techniques, as well as written work, such as script and character analysis, and classes in scene painting, lighting and makeup. The students and teachers earned one hour of college credit.

This is the second summer for the workshop, Uthoff said.

"We've gotten such good responses on it that we were hoping we could continue it," she said.

"One of the strengths of the workshop," Uthoff said, "is that it is coordinated with the Summer Repertory Theatre. It gives the students and the teachers a chance to work with college actors."

"They (students) actually got to act with college students on stage. That was a really big thrill for them...they got to learn a lot just by being with more experienced actors on the stage."

As part of the workshop, the students were required to attend the three Summer Repertory Theatre productions, Uthoff said, and the next morning there would be a critique session.

Uthoff said it was "especially helpful for them to see college actors and talk to them about their work."

"I was able to talk to them on an equal level rather than as a professor," Richter said, adding that he enjoyed the individual attention the students received.

The high school teachers, on the other hand, had the opportunity to learn to become better directors, Uthoff said. Although they also had to attend classes, the teachers critiqued the students' performances.

Each student did a scene from the first act of Beth Henley's "The Miss Firecracker Contest," with each high-school teacher directing a different scene.

Auctions mix business, social settings

By PEGGY SHANDY
Collegian Reporter

Speaking into a collar microphone, the auctioneer calls for a dollar bid, receives it, then calls for a dollar and a half.

The cry is heard across the back yard where 80 to 90 people are gathered around plywood tables.

The bidding quickly escalates as people strain to look at the object being held up for sale.

Seated behind a 3-foot-high podium and under a large orange Sunkist umbrella, Earl Brown of Brown Real Estate & Auction Service, Junction City, acknowledges the bid and calls for the next.

"People do just about anything to signal a bid," Brown said. "They wiggle a finger, raise a hand, nod, blink or flip their card."

"I have even seen people talking together, and one didn't even know the other was bidding until he had bought the item."

Auctions in the Manhattan and Junction City areas are held for a variety of reasons throughout the year. The most common types are estate, dispersal, antique and industrial, Brown said. Others include farm, foreclosures and real estate auctions.

Although auctions have been a form of selling items for years, they have just recently become a social event, as well, he said.

Some people are continual auction attenders, Brown said. They come just to see what is for sale and what prices are being paid and to take home a few "bargains."

Many people buy items at auctions for resale or for collections, he said, while others come just to visit with friends.

"There is a regular turnover (of regular auction attenders) every few years," Brown said. "They come religiously for two to five years and collect anything. Then they either get burnt out or they complete their collections."

Planning an auction takes much more time than calling one, said Milt Anderson of Anderson Realty and Auction, Manhattan. The auctioneer must be aware of the items being sold and their possible worth.

"We buy about 10 books every year," Brown said. "I research before an auction to find values of items or any special pieces the bidders should know about."

Averaging about 100 to 125 auctions a year each, Brown and Anderson said it is important for auctioneers to research and check on the items they are selling.

They both said bidders must also know on what they are bidding.

There are many reproductions on the market in furniture, glassware and jewelry, Brown said. The bidder should know before the auction the value of an item, be able to spot a reproduction and, if possible, bring someone to the auction who is knowledgeable about the item.

"A lot of times, things will bring more at an auction than they will downtown," Anderson said.

People get excited and caught up in the bidding, Brown said. They get carried away and may not realize what they are spending or what they are buying.

To avoid any problems in bidding or payment, each auction begins with an explanation of their rules and the terms of sale, Anderson and Brown said. Clerks for both auctioneers assign numbers to bidders.

"We require a picture ID if we don't know the person when they get their number," said Virginia Brown, Brown's wife and sale clerk at the auctions.

As all auctioneers develop their own rules and terms of sale, the person should check with the clerk or auctioneer, she said.

Besides having different rules, no two auctioneers "chant" the same, Brown said. It is impossible to mimic someone.

One problem auctioneers encounter is the boredom of the crowd.

"We change auctioneers every 30 to 35 minutes because you start slowing down," Brown said. "We have timed ourselves and find the audience begins getting restless."

Brown said his theory is that listening to the same chant for an hour can be dull.

"Everybody's chant is different," he said. "A new guy's chant may be hard to understand and will perk up the audience."

"The audience has to pay more attention to understand a different guy."

Another problem they encounter is scheduling auctions, Anderson said.

"There are so many more auctions than there used to be," Anderson said. "A lot of them are scheduled on Saturdays. We have started scheduling them on weekday evenings and Sunday afternoons to avoid competition with other auctions."

"In fact, Sunday afternoons will invariably bring the largest crowd."

A main consideration in the scheduling of auctions and the layout of the sale bills is to bring the most money for the seller, Brown said.

"I have an obligation to my seller not to give their stuff away," he said.

Many of the sellers are families, divorce cases, foreclosures or an elderly person going into a retirement home who needs all the money they can get for their items, Anderson said. It is the auctioneer's responsibility to get what is possible for the items.

Anderson said it is possible to find people who are not honest and may not run a sale correctly. To help regulate the auction business, a state committee is studying the feasibility of enacting a Kansas certification law.

A certification law would require auctioneers to pass a certification test and apply before beginning business, he said.

Kansas is one of the few states without any type of certification laws for auctioneers unless they sell real estate, Brown said.

Brown and Anderson have both completed courses from the Certified Auctioneers Institute at Indiana University, Bloomington, to study regulations, legal obligations, how to avoid errors and current problems relating to auctioneering.

Telephone system partially in place

By ANNJELA HYNES
Collegian Reporter

The new telephone system already installed in some campus buildings is part of a statewide project that has been in the planning stages for about four years, said Robert Young, assistant director for Telecommunications.

The actual implementation of the project, which also includes the University of Kansas, The Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University, the University of Kansas Medical School and all state offices in Topeka, began in spring 1986.

The project was set up by the state's Division of Information Systems and Communications, but each site will be responsible for the installation and servicing of its system.

Russell Getter, director of the Division of Information Systems and Communications, said the system was needed for several reasons.

The main factor in the initiation of the project was to control the cost of the state's telephone system, he said.

"The telecommunications equipment was old-style equipment that was expensive to service," Getter said, adding that it was also expensive to move the telephones because they were hardwired into the wall.

Young said the state "needed to make some improvements (in addition to) controlling the cost."

Getter said the new system will save the state about 5 percent.

"We can control the cost and get new features that would usually cost more," Getter said. "In the same way that computers are getting more powerful and cheaper, some telephone equipment is becoming more powerful and cheaper."

The need for a new telephone system came about when AT&T divested. At that time, the state had been leasing telephones from the company. Since the state bought the telephones, the number of lines connected to AT&T has been reduced, Young said. This is one of the ways the state plans to save money.

The new system has features the old system could not offer such as touch-tone dialing and speaker phone capabilities, Young said.

The campus buildings in which the systems have not yet been installed are the K-State Union, Farrell Library, Waters Hall, Holton Hall and the Veterinary Medicine Center.

White House cautiously optimistic about Gorbachev offer

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House on Wednesday welcomed Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev's announcement on medium- and shorter-range missiles, but cautioned that similar statements in the past have later been coupled with "unacceptable conditions."

Gorbachev, in an interview published in the Indonesian journal Merdeka, said the Kremlin is ready to eliminate its medium-and-shorter-range missiles in Asia if the United States does not insist on stationing 100 mid-range warheads in Alaska. The interview was reported by the Soviet news agency Tass.

Presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Secretary of State George P. Shultz and National security adviser Frank C. Carlucci discussed the report with President Reagan shortly after it was received at the White House.

"We welcome reports of Soviet acceptance of the president's proposal for the global elimination of U.S. and Soviet longer-range missiles, initially made in November of 1981," Fitzwater said.

"Such an agreement, if achieved, would result in the complete global elimination of this class of missiles," he said. "This would substantially reduce the Soviet military threat to both Europe and Asia."

He said it would also facilitate verification of arms control, which the United States has described as a major stumbling block to agreement with the Soviets.

Fitzwater said Gorbachev's reported offer to agree to eliminate shorter-range missiles echoed a proposal of the United States and its allies on June 16.

However, Fitzwater added, "We have seen statements of positive Soviet responses before only to later discover unacceptable conditions. We therefore look forward to seeing their official statement at the Geneva negotiations."

The spokesman told reporters that

"there did not appear to be any conditions in the account we have read this afternoon."

The official Soviet position was expected to be presented in Geneva on Thursday. Maynard W. Glitman, the U.S. negotiator on intermediate nuclear forces will represent the United States at the session.

"It gives us some reason for encouragement in terms of the final treaty agreement as well as a possible summit," Fitzwater said of the announcement.

The United States and the Soviet Union have been discussing a possible summit meeting between Gorbachev and Reagan in the United States sometime in the next few months.

"If this turns out to be the response to our offer that it looks to be, we would generally find it very encouraging," he said.

A senior administration official, who demanded anonymity, was asked whether the Soviet proposal would eliminate the problem of verification.

Gorbachev and Reagan agreed in principle at their summit in Reykjavik, Iceland, last October to eliminate all but 100 long-range intermediate nuclear forces, the SS-20s on the Soviet side and the Pershing 2s and cruises in the U.S. arsenal.

Cooperation of schools strengthens education

This fall a group of 15 students will take part in a joint project between K-State, The University of Kansas and a Kansas City area architectural firm. This program will allow students from both universities to study architectural problems and designs in an urban setting.

Programs like this one should be highly praised. Joining effort and time between K-State and KU seems beneficial. In these tough economic times for education in Kansas, it is only wise that the two schools put aside their inherent "rivalry" and work together to raise the quality of education in the state.

And while rivalries have their place and are very much a part of the college experience, they should not keep students from gaining the most knowledge available to them.

Coors offers facts

Editor,
A recent article in the Kansas State Collegian (Scott Miller's column, June 18) contains a number of false allegations and inaccurate information concerning Adolph Coors Company. We respectfully offer the following in order to set the record straight.

Adolph Coors Co. is not a racist company. Our current workforce — nearly 10,000 strong — is 17 percent minority and 22 percent women, making us a leader in our industry. Additionally, one-third of our employees are veterans. Coors has received many awards from numerous national veterans organizations for outstanding hiring practices. Each year the company provides more than $500,000 for college scholarships through the Coors Veteran's Memorial Scholarship Fund.

Additionally, Coors signed pacts with representative organizations from both the black and Hispanic communities pledging a total of $560 million in job opportunities, contributions, scholarships, purchases from minority-owned firms and investments in minority-owned banking institutions.

Coors does not discriminate against homosexuals. Sexual orientation is a personal matter we, as an employer, have no need nor desire to know. We are interested only in hiring the best qualified candidates. Period.

Rumors that Coors contributes to the Contras in Nicaragua are similarly false. Adolph Coors Company makes no contributions to any such groups. Instead, Coors donates annually to many worthy causes, ranging from women's associations to universities and minority groups.

We would like to extend an invitation to everyone to visit our facility in Golden, Colo. Our brewery — the world's largest — is open to the public and anyone who is curious about how we do business is welcome to see for themselves.

Barring the logistics of a trip to Colorado, we offer the findings of CBS-TV's "60 Minutes" and Mike Wallace, who came to Coors to investigate these very allegations. The findings, which were first aired on national television in September 1982 and repeated the following summer, found no basis for the allegations.

Thank you for this opportunity to put forth the facts. We believe Kansas State University students should have the freedom to choose between our beer and that of our competitors. We are proud of our unique product and equally proud of our progressive, employee-oriented and community-committed company.

Need tough policy

Editor,
It seems to me that Americans, far more than any other people I've known, feel the need to moralize, justify our behavior based on some elevated values more important than self-interest. Normally, it is just self-serving talk. That's OK. We are all selfish. But we're not the most honest folks in the world and that's not so OK.

I think Americans have watched so many movies and so much television that they unconsciously think the whole world is discernible as "good guys" and "bad guys."

We want everyone to think of us as the good guys. We are so protective of that image that we sometimes make political decisions that support the image and don't necessarily satisfy our pragmatic interests. Often we are faced with decisions that entail conflicting values. Self preservation (as an individual, family, community or nation) darn well better supercede human rights issues in another country. I, for one, do not wish to see my country threatened or my children die in conflict just so I can continue to piously say, "I'm a good guy."

For Americans, good guys and bad guys isn't the issue in Nicaragua.

The Soviet Union has, in a sense, experienced her own era of "manifest destiny." (Not a precise description, but it suffices.) She has reached out and touched a lot of countries. Generally, we have watched Soviet expansion without much contest, just an occasional verbal or economic stone. We haven't drawn many lines in the dirt; at least, not with much commitment. With the two lines we did draw, we ended up with a tie and a loss.

Good old Americans, having to maintain our image of the good guys, have tried to support the Contra rebels, hoping they would gain popular strength and enough "umph" to depose Ortega and company. You might say, "Good try, guys." But I think it wasted effort. But I would far rather we take an honest stance and inform the Soviets and the rest of the world, "We will not tolerate another Soviet satellite in our part of the world. Our first allegiance is to ourselves."

We do not have to run roughshod over other countries; just draw the lines distinctly. Then don't tolerate any breach. The other way is to be slowly nibbled at, encircled, strangled and threatened until we are faced with the choice of rolling over and going belly-up or entering total, unwinnable conflict.

You see, Nicaragua isn't an issue of good guys and bad guys. It is an issue of power and threat. Americans seem very reluctant to exercise power without the trappings of moral righteousness and indignation. We might well be able to save a lot of American lives in the future if we can learn to deal with the rest of the world (and ourselves) with greater honesty. There is nothing wrong with providing for the security of our nation, and it is far wiser to handle small fires before they burn the house down.

To avoid war requires absolute unyielding to actions that threaten our national security. We have drawn a few lines around the world — they should have included Cuba and Nicaragua. I'm just worried the super-moralists will keep jerking on our toes until the line is past the gate, front yard and into the house. Then we'll have the big war. And I sure as hell don't want it.

Magical power of the podium

Mysteries have always been a part of modern living — both in a theatrical sense and in real life. Many television shows have devoted air time that could have otherwise been given to "I Love Lucy" reruns just to unravel the contradictions of life. Such is my task today. So forget about Ricky and his bongos and come with me as we explore the source and use of a strange power. Come with me In Search Of...The Power of the Podium.

A podium, as we all know, is a speaking stand, a lectern. But this investigative reporter chooses to use a broader definition of the term. As far as we are concerned today, a podium is anything that hides the lower half of the human body from view — countertops, booths, etc.

Now, about this mysterious power that podiums have. It's become all too evident to me as I've worked several stints in the K-State Players box office this summer that my booth apparently gives me an aura. You see, people will walk into the building and ask me questions as if I were a wise man atop a mountain.

Suddenly, it seems, I possess all the knowledge in the universe — Where are the restrooms? Where's professor So-and-So's office? How long has this building been restored? What is the chemical makeup of paste? Why does Bill Cosby do Jell-O Pudding Pop commercials? The list is endless.

Many persons use the power of the podium. Politicians, preachers, teachers and even newscasters. Each one of them gains a certain credibility from their podiums. They become an expert, despite the fact they are reading from prepared scripts.

What gives podiums this power? There are several theories. Some say that podiums remind us, subconsciously, of the magician's box in which he saws a lady in half. Others say making only the upper half of the body visible is a common practice among ghost-like images. This all, of course, serves to capture our attention and keep it until the end of the speech.

However, no matter what the reason, it seems only right — given the society we live in — to make the most of the power of the podium. So, I've come up with some alternative uses for the power.

Every freshman should have one. If, indeed, podiums give one instant credibility, then freshmen could walk around campus and not a single person would be able to pick them out from the upper classmen.

Rear Adm. John Poindexter could use one. Given his shabby testimony and his uncanny ability to forget events and documents, it would seem he needs all the podiums for sale on the East Coast. He might be even more positively viewed by the country if he stacked two podiums on top of each other and simply hid behind them.

Presidential candidates should use them. If only Gary Hart had had a podium strapped to his waist. Sneaking out the back door would have been more difficult and maybe, just maybe, he would've stayed at home.

American Motors Co. should use them. Each one of AMC's new automobiles — and I use the term loosely — should come equipped with power brakes and power podiums.

Job interviewees should have one. In fact, maybe Holtz hall should start a Rent-A-Podium program for all students who have interviews. The podiums could be color coordinated to match the standard interviewing apparel — pin-striped, navy blue or gray. Imitation alligator-skin podiums could be available on written request.

The United States Football League definitely could have used a podium or two. If only the USFL had used podiums instead of cheerleaders. In fact, with podiums strapped to each player, knee injuries would have undoubtedly been reduced. Therefore, the USFL would have not only gained credibility as an entertaining sports league, but also would have been known as a safety conscious organization.

But why stop with these people? Why shouldn't everyone who wants a podium be able to get one? In fact, a whole new area of telemarketing could open up. The Home Shopping Club could sell podiums; they could be the introductory gift when you subscribe to Time magazine or they could be sold on their own — simply dial 1-800-PODIUMS, our operators are standing by.

Now perhaps all this seems a little absurd to you. The mere thought of mass marketing podiums, booths and other leg-hiding devices seems outlandish. You say that if freshmen were given podiums then all you'd have is a group of confused teen-agers bumping into one another and scratching their artificial wood-grain finishes.

You're probably right. Freshmen will forever be freshmen and presidential candidates will forever make promises they can't keep. But the power of the podium remains. And it is up to each one of us to make certain we are influenced by what a speaker is saying and not by what he is standing behind.

Politics could be less abstract

Throughout the Iran-Contra scandals, the thing I am the most impressed by is the human drama as revealed in the testimony. Politics is often very cut and dried with different "isms" and schisms fighting each other on the political stage. Concepts originally born straight from the flesh of their adherents have become reduced to abstract entities such as "justice," "freedom," "the Constitution" and "patriotism."

Bearing this in mind, it is refreshing to see the human side of the participants pushing through the rhetoric. This is what has caused a shift in opinion regarding Oliver North. Although people might disagree with his opinions when discussing them rationally, the American empathy for the underdog comes to the forefront when they perceive North as being one against many or when they perceive him as being one individual doing battle with the faceless system of Congress.

What is forgotten in this perception of the situation is that Congress is also made up of individuals. This became quite clear with Sen. Daniel Inouye's closing remarks to North. While North represented one side of the abstract concept of patriotism, Inouye represented another. This was graphically illustrated by Inouye's personal history — he is a Japanese-American who lost his arm in combat while his parents were in America's version of a concentration camp.

It is also forgotten that if we depersonalize Congress and regard it as a faceless system, we should also depersonalize the executive and judicial branch in order to be fair and accurate. North is just as much a representative of a faceless system (if not more so) as congressmen are. In fact this depersonalization seems to happen more and more in our society. If anything, it is becoming an increasing aberration for the individual, non-abstract side of politics to show through on the national level.

At first glance this might seem a funny thing to say considering the popularity of Reagan's personality or the demise of a presidential candidate because of alleged adultery. However, I would argue that if we look a little closer we will see that the political sphere effaces or ignores those things that individuals comprise. The exterior of systems and easy solutions replaces the interior of feelings, emotions and complexities. Consider the following examples.

Although the popularity of our current president supposedly is based on his charm and personality, often this personality is no personality at all. This struck me most forcibly a few days ago when reporters asked Reagan if he knew of what Colonel North had done. A very simple question with a very simple answer — yes or no. But Reagan could not bring himself to answer. Instead, a few minutes later his press secretary, Marlin Fitzwater, came out to say that the president had not known of North's actions.

He does not even have the courage to face us directly. The personality of the president is, if anything, a lack of personality. Even worse, such actions raise the question of whether the man is lying or needs time to rehearse his lines and so puts a front-man in his place.

A second example is the case of Gary Hart. Recently he withdrew from the presidential race because of allegations of adultery. This might also seem like an examination of the interior of the individual but I would argue that it, too, stayed focused on the exterior. No one delved into the raw emotions that would prompt Hart's actions. In essence, the electorate refused to give Hart the kind of treatment they would expect others to give them in their personal lives — an acknowledgment of the complexities of action and existence as a human.

A final example is the current treatment of the issue of AIDS. Attention is focused on the disease and its symptoms and little attention is paid to what causes people to be at risk in the first place — the possibility of genuine love between homosexuals, or the other inner motivations that would put a person at risk.

Politics seems some airy region where abstract and easy solutions are the rule. This is unfortunate and disturbing since the things politics deal with are actually quite down to earth and complex. To effectively solve political issues we must be aware of this human dimension.

In all of this, it is as if we resist discussing the inner complexities among ourselves. Somehow descriptions of the inside (adultery, AIDS, etc.) become descriptions of an outside, preconceived system. The result is we never get at the core. This attitude causes us to talk at each other instead of to each other.

Perhaps there is no way to completely remove ourselves from this tendency to deal with exteriors as we attempt to understand the world. However, I would suggest that we make the attempt. Surely ingesting a little more feeling and humanity into the political sphere would not hurt a thing.

New program teaches exceptional musicians

By ANGELA D. MARKLEY
Collegian Reporter

Challenging high school students with exceptional musical abilities is the purpose of the Summer Choral Institute Program to be held at K-State July 28 through Aug. 1.

Rod Walker, professor of music and director for the program, said the University benefits from challenging exceptional students' musical abilities.

"One way the University benefits from the program is by recruitment for the K-State Choir," Walker said. "Many of the students like what the University has to offer."

"Since they are high school students who are planning on attending college, they find this program a good way to explore the University. Forty percent of the students from last year's program chose to come to K-State following graduation."

The program was started nine years ago and has become very selective in who may participate.

"We had 300 sophomore- and junior-age high school students audition for this program in April," Walker said. "Of the 300, we chose 60 students to participate in the program."

Auditions were held in Wichita and on campus for out-of-state and Kansas students. Walker said the students were chosen on their musical talent as well as their academic abilities.

"All the students are very bright and talented," he said. "The average grade point average for this group of students is 3.6. One of the criteria for this program is that they do have very good grades."

The program is jointly sponsored by The Master Teacher Institute for the Arts and K-State, Walker said. Since they fund the program and the students attend the program at no cost, they must be of scholarship material.

Walker said the students will arrive on campus July 28 to begin rehearsals. Fifty-four of the students will study voice, while the other six will study keyboard instruments.

"The students in the choir not only sing as a group, but they also perform solos and attend individual voice classes," he said. "The students who are studying the keyboard instruments accompany the soloists during practice and during the final concert."

"The kids in the past all seem to work well together and I feel this year will be no different. Since this is a learning experience we keep the students busy at all times but not enough to burn them out."

A final concert for parents and the public at 2 p.m. Aug. 1. will conclude the week.

Proceeds from Nelson show to benefit Kansas Farm Aid

By RHODA REIN
Collegian Reporter

Country music star Willie Nelson is coming to K-State Sept. 5 to "play the field" — the football field.

Immediately following the first football game against Austin Peay State University, Clarksville, Tenn., Nelson will entertain K-Staters with a concert, with the proceeds going to Kansas Farm Aid.

Mike Jones, business manager for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said the department will contribute $4 to the farm relief program from every ticket sold after the University covers concert expenses.

"Nelson and Farm Aid have given over $85,000 to Kansas farmers in the last two years," said Stan Ward, Manhattan director of Farmers Assistance Counseling and Training Service.

The 90-minute concert will take place at the north end of the stadium between the 30- and 40-yard lines, Jones said. Nelson will perform on a 12-foot-high circular stage surrounded by speakers.

"Willie will work around the whole stage, so you will be sitting center stage no matter where you are," Jones said. "Because of the height of the stage, the eye-level seats will be row 10 and above."

The concert will make the Labor Day game package more entertaining, he said. It also is an added value to season ticket holders.

"We are attracted to the concert because there are no student-funded concerts this year, and this will also be a way to make football and University social life more exciting," Jones said.

Connie Tilton, office secretary of the Consultation of Cooperating Churches of Kansas, said state farmers who need help request Farm Aid through their priest or pastor.

"On behalf of the family in need, the clergy requests money from the Interfaith Rural Life committee," Tilton said. "The money is given out in a gift of $100 per farm family for need of any kind."

"Farm Aid seems to be managed lots better than some charities," Jones said. "Farmers may use the money to buy whatever they need."

Tilton said many families are too proud to ask for aid directly, so this confidential method through the clergy has worked well. A religious affiliation is not required of families seeking aid.

"In one case we received a returned check," Tilton said. "I suppose the family decided they did not need the money they had requested."

Flash Cadillac to relive 'old times'

By The Collegian Staff

The Arts in the Park entertainment series comes to a close at 8 p.m. Friday with a concert by Flash Cadillac on the City Park stage.

Don Cukjati, director of Arts in the Park, said Flash Cadillac is a six-member band that plays '50s- and '60s-style rock 'n' roll.

Flash Cadillac, which has played in Manhattan for the past three years, has become very popular with the residents of Manhattan, he said.

"In the past, Flash Cadillac has been one of the more popular groups to play in the series," Cukjati said.

The members of Flash Cadillac have been playing together for about 20 years, he said. The group has performed music for the movies "Apocalypse Now" and "American Graffiti" and has appeared on "American Bandstand," Cukjati said.

"People usually start showing up around 6 p.m.," Cukjati said. "Flash Cadillac has an excellent reputation around this area. This will cause the crowd to be overly large."

"We are expecting 5,000 to 6,000 people at the concert, so if people want to see Flash Cadillac in the final performance of the Arts in Park entertainment series, they had better come early."

The concert will be a real family affair. Flash Cadillac appeals to a wide range of ages, he said.

"For people who want a full evening of fun and entertainment, the Flash Cadillac concert would definitely be a must to see," Cukjati said.

Alternative musical group offers unordinary lyrics, driving tempo

By ALISON NEELY
Collegian Reporter

Conformity is not a known buzz word for alternative music. Appropriately, neither the members of Erasure nor the lyrics they sing can be classified as ordinary.

Erasure is currently completing the fifth week of a seven-week tour with the rock group Duran Duran. The musical styles of the two groups vastly differ, but both lead singer Andy Bell and Vince Clark, a group member, agreed no real problems have been encountered.

"If they (the crowds) don't like you, they just sit there...So far we've only had two non-reactive audiences," Bell said.

Erasure's music is a high-energy mixture of soul and pop, Clark said. The traditional guitars, drums and keyboards are not part of the group's music. The driving beat comes from computers and synthesizers. The duo, along with two back-up singers, perform the music written by Clark.

The commercial success already experienced by the group is a minor part of Erasure's goal, but band members said imitation of other groups and styles is the single most undesired attribute.

"I think it'd be nice to be original and entertaining and not just with our music, but with our stage show as well," Bell said.

Bell and Clark both agreed that much too often new musical groups are not taken seriously, especially in the United States.

"In the U.K. (United Kingdom) they've always got these fashion fads and they last for about three months. They always latch onto a hit group," Bell said.

Clark said Erasure members are trying to avoid this category so they "...will be long-term and not just like some one-hit wonder."

Although few people in the United States have heard of Erasure, they are quite popular in Britain, Clark said. One reason is that it's much easier to get radio play in Britain than the United States.

"All the American radio stations rely on advertisers and, therefore, can't afford to play anything experimental because they don't want to lose their advertisers," he said.

Britain's broadcasting system is owned by the government and has no obligation to advertisers. None of the stations are a designated format such as rock or country, Clark said, so they play whatever they like.

Size is another factor in Erasure's success in Britain.

"America is a vast country. Trying to make it in the U.K. is like trying to make it in one state here," Bell said.

The first album, "Wonderland," is up-beat dance music. Bell said it was a recording with no special meaning.

"On the first album we hardly knew each other, so we were just recording tunes for the sake of it," Bell said. "On the second album we had to think a lot more about it."

The second album, "Circus," has been labeled political and intellectual. Clark dismissed this analysis as critical gossip.

"I think they're reading too much into it; that's what critics always do anyway. They've got to spout out something," he said.

Plans for the future include a third album after the tour. The band is also considering a U.S. club circuit tour. If Erasure is to tour with another major star or group, members said, the choice would be Madonna.

In addition to having all three of their videos distributed, band members said they have been given minimal air time by the U.S. networks.

Opening act bops better than Duran Duran

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

These days, the word disco can practically be defined as "musical curse." However, say "high energy synth," and people radiate approval.

Music Review

The audience that gathered at Sandstone Amphitheater in Bonner Springs Monday night to hear Duran Duran was treated to an unusually good warm-up band — Erasure, a popular British high-energy group. As to be expected, Duran Duran had an incredible stage presentation, complete with an outstanding light show.

Duran Duran provided a really good performance, but it was Erasure that provided the unique touch that captured the audience's imagination. One could almost tell simply by looking whether a fan had come to see Duran Duran or Erasure.

As with most concert crowds, the Duran Duran fans varied in age and appearance; however, the Erasure fans seemed to be consistently wild. The young woman (roughly 16) who dyed her hair stop-light red and was wearing what looked like red and black lingerie comes to mind. Not to be forgotten was the 12- to 14-year-old boy wearing an outfit that resembled a combination of Chairman Mao Tse-tung and Sgt. Pepper. One teen-ager had his or her hair cut and moussed into long spikes, standing straight in the air, in a style reminiscent of Cher.

However, all bizarre outfits in the audience were immediately forgotten at the first sight of Andy Bell, Erasure's lead singer, as he popped onto stage.

Bell wore a black leather teddy-like muscle suit, complete with red tights, a red leather formal jacket with tails and black boots. Bell had little trouble capturing the audience's attention.

The fascination the group held for the fans became obvious as more and more people became involved in the show. As is typical with an opening act, people continued to file into the amphitheater during Erasure's performance, their main goal being to see Duran Duran. All in all, the Erasure fans, identified as the ones dancing wildly in the aisles, numbered at most 5 percent of the total audience.

By the end of Erasure's half-hour performance, at least 25 percent of the audience, which was in itself substantially larger, was up and dancing. In other words, it would be safe to say that Erasure was greeted with approval.

Even if Bell, Vince Clark, instrumentalist for the team and the two back-up vocalists had worn jeans and T-shirts, the performance would still have been great because of Erasure's musical energy.

The music was intense, loud, biting — and it never let up. Clark skillfully controlled the synthesizer, keyboard, guitar and other musical effects for the entire show with calm dexterity. The rapid, bone-jarring rhythm was always present, easily marking the group as a perpetrator of the high-energy dance trend.

In fact, if the group's performance had any serious fault, it would be the completely unrelenting rhythm. After a while the beat became monotonous until even the lightest dance song sounded ponderous.

However, the performance was not without variety. Bell's vocal style and stage antics changed with every song.

For "All My Love," a smooth love song notwithstanding the pounding rhythm, Bell seated himself at the edge of the stage and swung his feet, relating directly to the audience, until the rhythm got to him and he jumped up to dance some more.

"Now we're going to cool down a little," Bell announced as the intro to "Matter of Time." The back-up vocalists left the stage, and Bell poured his heart and soul into the microphone. The song showed a calmer side of his performance ability.

The calm proved to precede a storm. The group swung into "Who Needs Love Like That," a high-energy strut song. Bell complied by accompanying his vocals with long struts across the stage. The dancing in the audience became even more frantic.

"Oh l'Amour" utilized creative three-part harmonies. The song showed the three singers' musical skill and vocal range, as the song went higher and higher, ending on a chord built from three very high notes.

All in all, the Erasure performance was easily just as enjoyable as the main show, a la Duran Duran. In fact, Duran Duran could hardly have made a better choice for an opening act because Erasure got the audience in the mood for another high-energy performance.

When the lights went down and dry ice steam began to pour onto stage, the crowd freaked out. Duran Duran came onto a stage flooded with red light pulsing to the rhythm of a heavy bass heartbeat. Suddenly, the aura was punctuated with white flood lights, and Duran Duran was off and running with "View to a Kill."

The instrumental and vocal sound of the group was incredibly smooth, and the heavy thump rhythm which shook the floor was in sharp contrast to Erasure's high-energy pounding.

The light show started off as shades of red, punctuated by the white of the stage set-up, the grey of the backdrop and the black of the band members' outfits. With the second song, shades of purple and blue infiltrated the red, a trend which continued throughout the show. All in all, the lights created an incredible emphasis for a successful concert.

Duran Duran is a highly accomplished group which doesn't disappoint its fans in concert, delivering just as much energy and sound in concert as on wax.

The only real problem with the show was not in performance quality, but rather had to do with a preponderance of the group's old music. Duran Duran has had several smash hits, but the band has not yet released the new album.

As a result, there was little about the Duran Duran half of the concert that was new and different. Regardless, the show was an exciting and emotional experience, an interesting blend of old and new successes.

Young and old at the Natatorium

Participants gather at 7:30 a.m. for hydroaerobics.

Floy Koon, 82, does her exercises at the Natatorium. She has been coming to hydroaerobics for 10 years. On occasion she has led the class when the teacher was absent.

By ELTON MAYFIELD
Collegian Reporter

Even though Ina and Ralph Toothaker both have had heart bypass surgery, they may be discovering the fountain of youth at the Natatorium. Every morning at 7:30, the Toothakers, 67 and 69 respectively, workout at the hydroaerobic class doing exercises such as the cheerleader jump, crabwalk and the applepicker.

"We have been doing this for over a year, and we really feel great," Ina said.

The Toothakers along with other adults in Carol Stites' hydroaerobic class are learning the benefits of water aerobics with a 45-minute workout every morning.

The class is being offered by the Department of Physical Education and Leisure Studies. In order to participate in the class, a person must purchase a facilities use card through the department.

Floy Koon started taking hydroaerobic classes 10 years ago. On occasion, when the instructor was absent, Koon has led her class in exercises. Now, at the age of 82, Koon said she still enjoys "working out" and feels great because of it.

"It's not a form of hydrotherapy, but it does have therapeutic effects," Stites said.

Stites said there are four therapeutic benefits from hydroaerobics: the water massages a person as he or she is working out, the temperature warms the muscles and increases elasticity, the buoyancy reduces the stress on the lower extremities and the water pressure increases circulation and forces the respiratory system to work harder.

"Being fit is not just an absence of disease," Stites said. "It also is the state of physical, mental and social well-being."

"Hydroaerobics helps all three. It reduces stress, is a social stimulus and people are able to participate even if they have injuries such as knee or back problems."

In addition to the Toothakers, several other people spoke of their new-found energy and desire to exercise since starting the hydroaerobic class.

Margaret Lansdown, 63, and her daughter Miriam Zeibert, 42, are members of the hydroaerobic class.

"She (daughter) gets after me if I don't go fast enough. We refer to the class as our social hour," Lansdown said.

"If more senior citizens took part in this, they would be a lot better off," said Louis Riseman, a retired geology professor from K-State.

Riseman, along with his wife Aldona, both age 77, have been participating in the hydroaerobic class for five years.

"We love doing this every day," Aldona said. "The class helps take the kinks out of our day and gives us the energy we need."

"This is a wonderful form of exercise. I would recommend it for anyone," Stites said.

ABOVE: Mary Dodd raises her arms as part of the 45-minute exercises. RIGHT: Violet Hermann and Marian Vincent stretch their arms. One of the four therapeutic benefits is that the water massages a person during a workout.

Christopher, 4, and Lindsey Palmiero, 2, decide who should jump off the diving board first. The summer classes are offered by the Division of Continuing Education.

Swimming lessons keep children, parents floating

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

A disturbing sight during community education swimming lessons is a 6-year-old child with a death grip around his instructor's neck.

This intense fear of water might have been prevented if the child had started swimming lessons five years earlier, said Shawn Fiscus, assistant coordinator for community education in the Division of Continuing Education.

"Six months is not too early," said Fiscus, who has been an instructor in the Natatorium for five years.

Although a child must be 6 years old to enter an American Red Cross beginner class, the program provides four levels in lower age groups, she said.

Parent-Infant (6 months to 1 year), Parent-Tot (1 to 4 years), Tweens (4 to 5 years) and Advanced Tweens (5 to 6 years) are offered during the summer and school year.

The Parent-Infant and Parent-Tot classes

last 30 minutes daily, she said. Morning sessions are scheduled for 11 and 11:30, and evening sessions are at 4:30, 5 and 5:30 for working parents.

A 30-minute session consists of the instructor using a child for demonstration of the day's lesson, and then the parents work with their child on the technique, Fiscus said.

Skills might include going underwater, blowing bubbles and reaching for toys, which is used as an introduction to the crawl and back floating, Fiscus said.

The older children learn safety rules such as climbing in and out of the pool and waiting for adult supervision.

In the 45-minute Tween session, the children learn pre-Beginner skills such as floating and kicking, but parents participate on parent days, she said.

"None of these kids are strong enough to really swim, but at least they can stay afloat long enough to get to the side without panicking," Fiscus said.

Only 2 years old, Naseem Nikaeen said she learned to swim by the end of the summer session.

Her mother, Saeedeh Nikaeen, said her daughter had made good progress.

"I didn't have the chance to learn to swim until I was an adult," she said. "I want Naseem to have that chance."

Some problems arise in teaching children that young, however, Fiscus said. Toddlers have short attention spans and tire easily.

Instructors must be constantly "up," positive and especially watchful with Tweens because they tend to let go of the side of the pool, she said.

"We stress positive facial expressions from the parents, even if they are afraid of the water themselves," Fiscus said. "The warm, shallow water helps them relax, but the kids need to see the approval."

Some parents can be irritating, she said. The ones who refuse to make their children do certain skills are only hurting them.

"Experts say no (parents) should teach (their) own child, and maybe that's true," Fiscus said. "Once a child is old enough to talk, he will try to manipulate his parents, and some people simply cannot be firm."

any positive tests as a health problem and do not plan to impose sanctions initially against athletes.

Drug tests will cost about $15 each through a contract with a local hospital, Quayle said. However, tests to detect the use of steroids can cost more than $100, he said.

Bob Frederick, director of athletics at KU, said a national trend that has received little publicity is the use of steroids among women college athletes.

Although steroid use most often has been associated with male athletes who take part in strength-related events, such as weight lifting or shot put, Frederick said the use of steroids has been detected among women engaged in all sports.

"The results can be more dramatic for female student athletes," Frederick said.

The athletic directors agreed that sharing information and cooperating to bring in speakers to educate students about the hazards of substance abuse would help all their programs combat drugs.

Earlier, the panel was told the use of illegal drugs has declined during the past decade on Kansas college campuses but alcohol abuse has emerged as a much greater problem.

Caryl Smith, associate vice chancellor for student affairs at KU, told the panel she was happy it was considering problems associated with liquor and beer consumption because student alcohol problems far outnumber drug problems on college campuses.

"And that is a widely held professional opinion," Smith said.

Smith it is hard to say whether alcohol abuse is a growing problem because the impact of legislation raising the legal drinking age from 18 to 21 "is still playing out."

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, agreed with Smith's assessment of alcohol abuse versus illegal drug use on campus.

For example, Arck said 9 percent of the students who participated in a recent survey at K-State said they had used cocaine at some point in their lives, compared with 94 percent who said they had used alcohol within the last year.

Over the past two years, Arck said there has been one drug-related death within the student population at K-State while seven deaths were related to alcohol consumption.

Arck distributed a sample brochure he said could be developed for distribution to students at all Board of Regents institutions. Smith said KU officials are now compiling results from a drug survey conducted on campus this spring.

the changes are practical because they would like to avoid any discrimination against a potential member.

"There has been a lot of misunderstanding about it, and in a lot of instances it hasn't been explained clearly. We basically want to get rid of any possibility of discrimination."

expect the Iranians to take any action against the convoy.

Iran's United Nations ambassador, Said Rajaie-Khorassani, said Wednesday that Iran won't interfere with the convoy unless Iraqi forces attack Iranian vessels.

"A Kuwaiti ship will become immediately a legitimate target if our ships are hit, simply because the revenue of those Kuwaiti tankers will go directly to the war machine of Iraq President Saddam Hussein," he said in an interview with ABC's "Good Morning America."

Iranian Prime Minister Hussein Musavi, appearing on state-run Iranian television, denounced the U.S. convoy as a "naval parade" that creates tension in the gulf.

Radio Moscow said the U.S. actions were "fraught aggravating tensions in the Persian Gulf."

White House Chief of Staff Howard H. Baker said in Washington that any response to the reflagging of the tankers is "up to Iran," but he added that he was "very hopeful" there wouldn't be any incidents.

Task force accepts highway proposal

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — More than 1,400 miles of new roads, at a cost of $1.58 billion, would be built in eight years under a plan to which the Governor's Highway Task Force gave its final approval Wednesday.

The plan now goes to Gov. Mike Hayden, who is expected to call a special session of the Legislature for the end of August for consideration of the proposal.

The task force's recommendations include a 5-cent increase in gasoline and diesel fuel taxes and an increase in vehicle registration fees ranging from 34.3 percent to 100 percent.

In all, the Department of Transportation would spend $5.37 billion over the lifetime of the plan. The figure includes the department's normal operations, increased maintenance, increased aid to cities and counties and the new construction.

Secretary of Transportation Horace Edwards, chairman of the task force, said its report will be formally delivered to Hayden on July 31. Kathy Peterson, Hayden's press secretary, said the governor would probably take a week to review the report before deciding whether to call a special session.

Peterson said Hayden sees nothing he objects to strongly in the report.

"He's pleased that they looked at our highway system in a comprehensive manner," Peterson said.

However, Hayden and task force members found themselves confronted with the issue of how to sell the plan to the public almost immediately after the 19-member panel approved it. Peterson said Hayden planned an extensive tour of the state in August to promote the plan, one including about a dozen stops.

Former Lt. Gov. Shelby Smith, leader of Economic Life Lines, a coalition of groups formed to lobby for a highway plan, said his group's members planned to make about 30 appearances across the state in August.

"Our basic goal is to go out and get constituents' support in the legislative districts," Smith said. "We felt it just has to be shoe leather, laryngitis and lots of hard work."

Predictions on how the plan will fare in the Legislature differ. Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton, chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said he thinks supporters in the House need some time to gather the votes needed for passage.

However, Crowell was optimistic about the plan's chances, saying he thought discussions over it would become an "all or nothing" debate, because lawmakers would be afraid to cut the plan back.

"I don't think we're there," Crowell said. "We're much closer than I ever dreamed we'd be."

The proposal includes 209 miles of new four-lane highways and 1,197 miles of new "Super Two" highways, two lanes with wide shoulders and passing lanes.

Gasoline taxes will increase from 11 cents a gallon to 16 cents a gallon on Jan. 1, 1988, and the tax on diesel fuel would increase from 13 cents to 18 cents a gallon.

Uncle of students donates $400,000

A retired merchant marine from Independence, Mo., has left nearly $400,000 to K-State.

William Haak was born in Russia in 1894 and moved to the United States when he was 8 years old. His interest in supporting a scholarship program stemmed from the education his niece and nephew received at K-State.

Although Haak had no formal schooling, he assembled a personal estate worth more than $1 million from his salary. The $400,000 gift to K-State will establish the William Haak Endowment Scholarship Fund. Scholarships will be awarded from the permanent endowment's interest.

K-State alumnus dies at 82 years

Edgar E. Coleman, creator of the first University faculty chair at K-State, died June 28. He was 82.

Instead of being funded by the state, a chair is a privately funded faculty position.

A 1925 graduate in general science, Coleman established the Edgar E. and M. Elisabeth Coleman Chair in Veterinary Medicine in 1985. The chair was funded by a $1 million trust.

Coleman also established the Edgar E. and M. Elisabeth Coleman Scholarships in Veterinary Medicine and the M. Elisabeth and Edgar E. Coleman Orchestra Chair in the Department of Music.

Coleman was granted an honorary doctorate from the College of Veterinary Medicine in 1986. The Kansas House of Representatives cited Coleman in 1985 for his outstanding service to K-State, veterinary medicine and music.

Graduate, seniors win competition

Four students in mechanical engineering have won a $1,000 award in a national engineering competition sponsored by Thompson and Formby Inc., of Memphis, Tenn.

Jeffery J. Ronning, Mark Corbin and Brian Bramel, seniors in mechanical engineering, along with Jon J. Held, graduate student in mechanical engineering, competed in a demonstration and judging event at the Marriott Marquis hotel in New York City. The students were required to develop a demonstration showing qualities of the lubricant Tri-Flow.

The students' demonstration featured weights sliding down three inclined glass planes. Each slide used a different lubricant. Test results showed the Tri-Flow traveled 19 inches. This was seven and nine inches farther than the other two lubricants used in the competition.

Students to use video disc for physics

By MICKY FORNARO Collegian Reporter

It's the perfect combination of physics and physical education. An interactive video disc called "Modeling the Motion of an Athlete" enables students to measure the motions of the athletes to help them understand physics principles.

The video disc, scheduled to be completed this winter, is a collaboration between Dean Zollman, professor of physics; M. Larry Noble and Miriam Satern, professors in leisure studies and physical education; and Ron Curtin, Manhattan

High School science teacher.

Zollman said the disc will help the students to better understand how the principles of physics apply to the principals of motion in an athlete.

With the disc, students can search for the scene they want to study and freeze it while they take measurements. Zollman said this is a big advantage in the teaching of physics principles to the high school and college student.

The disc is easy to use, and instructors can allow students to use it in settings, which would have been difficult with other visual media. The students may view the material on the disc at any rate of motion.

Acetate sheets are used to take measurements for velocity, acceleration, energy and force.

The fact that the motions on the disc are staged practices filmed with a fixed camera make taking the measurements with a disc possible. A normal video and camera cannot be used because television cameras move too much to allow for accurate measurements, Zollman said.

Sports was chosen as the topic of the video because most students can relate to the area, he said. The disc will include such sports examples as high jumping, pole vaulting, archery, shot put and long jump.

Zollman has completed other videos for teaching students physics, the aim of which is to show how physics applies to motions in everyday life and how to develop and use models to solve problems. The discs are effective for beginning levels of physics because students are able to see what they are measuring, he said.

The video disc will be available for sale to colleges and high schools. The video disc resembles a compact disc but is the size of a regular record album. Each side holds 30 minutes of video.

Journalism workshop attracts students

By PRIMUS SINGLETON III Collegian Reporter

The Department of Journalism and Mass Communications in conjunction with Student Publications Inc. is sponsoring a Flint Hills Publication Workshop this week for about 180 Kansas high school students who work on their school publications.

"The purpose of the workshop is to help the students assume leadership roles on their high school publications," said Dave Adams, associate professor of journalism and mass communications and director of Student Publications.

Adams, who organized the workshop, said it is composed of a newspaper division, which covers news writing, editing, layout and design; a yearbook division with a section for beginning and advanced students; a photography division, which contains sections for beginning and advanced students; an advertising and marketing division; and a publications adviser division, which will teach advisers their legal responsibilities and new trends in publication design and management.

Adams said the newspaper division will publish an eight-page newspaper, the Kedzie Krier, and the yearbook division will publish a 20-page mini-yearbook, the Wildcat. The photography division will take the photographs for both projects.

"The students will have long days, which begin as early as 7:30 a.m. and end (at) 9:30 p.m.," he said.

In addition, daily sessions will examine various journalism-related subjects.

On Thursday, Tim Janicke, picture editor for The Kansas City Times, will discuss "Photographing College Life: A Week at Kansas State."

Janicke is one of the photographers who took part in last semester's AWAKS project, Adams said.

Jackie Engel, who was the McPherson High School publication adviser for 21 years and has been involved with the workshop since 1966, said most of the students who participate in the workshop are just associated with their high school publications.

"I don't know if even 20 percent of them will become career journalists," Engel said.

Chris Dyer, senior at Shawnee Mission North, is attending the workshop for the first time. He plans on majoring in journalism and hopes it will help him make some choices.

"I think the workshop will help me decide which area of journalism I want to go into," Dyer said.

Amy Strathman, a senior at Centralia High School who attended the workshop last year, said the experience gained at the workshop has been a major influence on her high school yearbook.

"Last year, we went back and remodeled our entire yearbook," Strathman said. "I was an assistant editor then. This year I hope the workshop will make me a better editor."

Iran disregards resolution, vows to retaliate

By The Associated Press

KUWAIT — Iran said Monday the latest U.N. effort to end the Persian Gulf war is "not worth a penny" and told the United States it will retaliate for any attack.

The U.N. Security Council unanimously approved a resolution demanding a cease-fire in the 7-year-old war with Iraq but the Iranians said they would ignore it, as they have several previous resolutions.

U.S. Navy warships are stationed just outside the Strait of Hormuz, the narrow southern entrance to the gulf, preparing to escort Kuwaiti tankers that will sail under the American flag.

Kuwait is Iraq's western neighbor at the gulf's northern end. Iran accuses it of serving as a conduit for arms shipments to the Iraqis, whose ports have been closed since soon after the war started in September 1980.

Iran has attacked ships owned by or serving Kuwait frequently since last September and says it will not be deterred by U.S. Navy escorts for 11 reflagged Kuwaiti tankers or by Soviet presence in the Persian Gulf. Kuwait has leased three tankers from the Soviet Union.

Iran said its troops have launched new attacks in Iraq, but Iraq denied Iran's claim that its forces stormed the garrison town of Atrush in northeast Iraq on Sunday. Iraq said its soldiers drove back Iranian assaults on man-made islands in the southern Majnoon oilfields.

Dispatches from Iran, monitored in Nicosia, Cyprus, claimed 2,700 Iraqi soldiers had been killed or wounded in those attacks and others in the central sector of the 730-mile border. Iraq said its pilots downed an Iranian F-4 Phantom jet in a dogfight Sunday night over the northern gulf.

Conflicting claims could not be verified. Foreign journalists are allowed into war zones only on rare guided tours.

Tehran's official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted President Ali Khamenei as saying the U.N. effort was worthless and threatening retaliation for any attacks on Iranian vessels.

Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Velayati said Sunday that Iran would ignore any U.N. resolution that did not name Iraq, which began the war with an invasion, as the aggressor.

Khamenei, also head of the Supreme Defense Council coordinating the war, told an audience during a tour of Iran's northwestern Azerbaijan province Sunday that President Reagan was behind the Security Council resolution.

He said the sponsors expected Iran to enter negotiations with Iraq for what the official news agency called an "ignominious" peace.

"If Iran does not accept the resolution, it will be internationally pressured, more than ever," Khamenei said. "The superpowers are making a mistake and are ignorant of the spirit of devotion and resistance of our heroic nation."

Iraq has sought a negotiated settlement for years and supported the Security Council action. The Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Seyasseh reported Monday that Iraq would sharply reduce military operations in response to a resolution.

Students to learn architecture in KC

By ANNJELA HYNES
Collegian Reporter

Fifth-year students in the College of Architecture and Design will soon have the opportunity to expand their knowledge of architecture with hands-on experience on various projects in Kansas City, Mo.

This fall, about 15 architecture students from both K-State and the University of Kansas will participate in a studio in Kansas City that will enable them to consider some problems of architecture and design in an urban area where there are varying racial and ethnic differences, said George Thompson, director of the K-State College of Architecture and Design-Kansas City.

The opportunity to examine those particular problems might not exist in smaller towns such as Manhattan or Lawrence, but because Kansas City is a much larger city the students can gain valuable experience they might not be able to gain otherwise, Thompson said.

Twelve to 16 architecture students from K-State and KU will enroll in the studio class in August at UMKC as part of the design program.

"The function of the program is to promote various KU and K-State joint projects," said Robert Burnham, head of K-State's Department of Architecture.

Burnham said the program will offer students the opportunity to work in "a richer architecture environment," and they will come in close contact with urban designers and planners in Kansas City.

Because most graduates in architecture and design will usually find employment in large, metropolitan areas where aspects such as building size are different, they "need to be exposed to design analysis in a larger city," Thompson said.

Mark Lapping, dean of K-State's College of Architecture and Design, was also a "major force in recognizing the need" for such a program, said Lynn Ewanow, assistant dean of the college.

Currently, the programs focus mainly on architecture students, she said, but they hope to expand them to include landscape and interior design students, as well.

"We want to phase in studio opportunities for all of our students," Ewanow said.

The joint effort between KU and K-State is only a part of the program associated with the opening of the Regents Center for Architecture in Kansas City almost two years ago. The center has given design professionals, architects, teachers and architecture students an increased opportunity for continuing education in issues related to architecture and design, Thompson said.

In addition, the center provides faculty consulting and research facilities, gives students the opportunity to work on projects in an urban design environment and examines prevalent design issues through involvement with speakers and exhibits, he said.

The center was opened in September 1985, with Thompson a principle force in its initiation. KU became involved in the center's programs soon after, and a meeting between George Russell, chancellor of UMKC, and President Jon Wefald will be held later this summer to discuss the implementation of a design program for first- and second-year architecture students at UMKC.

In keeping up with the center's other goals, there will be an exhibit in August featuring nationally recognized landscape architects such as Beatrix Farrand, Fletcher Steele, James Rose, A.E. Bye, and Dan Kiley.

Another important project of the center in conjunction with the Hallmark Corporate Foundation and the Kansas City Redevelopment Authority is an urban landscape design symposium titled "Green Spaces/Urban Places," which will present a series of seven lectures beginning in August.

Barry Park, a student at Council Grove High School, lifts weights Monday morning at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. According to a recent report from the American Heart Association, weightlifting can be a dangerous sport.

Pumping iron may cause side effects

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

"No pain, no gain," can be a dangerous weight lifting theory, the American Heart Association has reported.

Dr. Peter A. Conrardy, president of AHA's Kansas Affiliate, said the results of a weight lifting program can mean a well developed physique, but there may be side effects.

"No doubt the person may also be able to lift heavier objects or may gain more strength," Conrardy said. "But many Americans don't know about the side effects of weight lifting."

Conrardy said weight lifting, especially free weights, can produce a sharp, sudden rise in a person's blood pressure. Some weight lifters have complained of headaches and signs of cerebral hemorrhages.

This has been true to a certain extent for K-State student-weight lifters at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Alan Funk, senior in education, has experienced quick head rushes following hard workouts, but said they are only temporary.

"It's normal to feel tired and dizzy after lifting," Funk said. "It goes away shortly after I'm done."

Scott Hofer, senior in architectural engineering who has pumped iron for four years, said he hasn't experienced any abnormal headaches or dizziness. He said some of the problems during the summer could be credited to the hot temperature and humidity in the Rec Center's weight room.

Conrardy said people could jog

Passage of highway bill proposal to lead to higher gas, diesel tax

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas would jump from near the middle to near the top among other states in what it charges in motor fuels taxes if the Legislature adopts the Governor's Highway Task Force recommendations for a new highway program, state officials said Monday.

But the officials, spokesmen for the state Department of Transportation, said the program would generate about 6,000 temporary jobs in the state and probably ensure that the state would not have to further increase taxes through the turn of the next century to finance KDOT projects.

Bob Haley, KDOT director of administration, and Deb Miller, director of planning and development, testified before the Legislature's Joint Committee on Economic Development to brief lawmakers on the task force's plan for $1.58 billion in new highway construction.

"Your condition of the facilities would be very good," Haley said. "You shouldn't have a deteriorating system."

The task force will meet Wednesday and is expected to give its final approval to the plan, which will then be forwarded to Gov. Mike Hayden, who is expected to call a special session of the Legislature for the end of August to consider it.

Under the plan, the state would build more than 1,400 miles of new highways across the state by 1996. Over eight years, KDOT would spend $5.37 billion on its normal operations, highway maintenance, construction and payments on bonds issued for construction. Of that, $1.58 billion would be for new construction.

A nickel increase in gasoline and diesel fuel taxes and an average 50 percent increase in vehicle registration fees finance the construction in the plan.

Haley said Kansas, which has a gas tax of 11 cents a gallon and a diesel tax of 13 cents a gallon, would jump from 39th in the nation for what car users pay in fuel taxes to 12th in the nation. For what truck drivers pay in fuel taxes, the state would go from 30th in the nation to sixth.

Haley also said the state would remain competitive with some surrounding states if its gas tax were increased, as proposed, to 16 cents a gallon and its diesel tax to 18 cents a gallon.

Colorado's gas tax is 18 cents a gallon, its diesel tax, 20.5 cents a gallon; Nebraska's, 19 cents and 17.1 cents; and Iowa 16 cents and 18.5 cents. Oklahoma's gas tax is 16 cents a gallon and its diesel tax is 13 cents a gallon. Missouri has a tax of 11 cents a gallon on both fuels.

Army ROTC plan to allow juniors into officer training

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Starting in August, the Army ROTC advertisements in the Collegian and the Fort Riley Post will have a slightly different target — juniors with no ROTC experience who have decided to go into officer training.

"There has always been a large demand for qualified officers," said Capt. Robert Shoemaker, enrollment coordinator.

"In the last two years, Cadet Command in Washington, D.C., has given students the option of a delayed decision about officer training," said Capt. Dana Bres, assistant professor of military science. "Now they can actually make that decision their junior year."

Traditionally, high school students choosing military careers would follow the regular program, Bres said. Their first two years of college would contain two military science classes.

"The basic courses consist of skills like first aid, leadership, map reading, riflery and the role of the military in the United States today," he said. "At the same time, the person can pursue a separate major."

Then they would take two more military science courses during their junior and senior years, followed by six weeks at the Fort Riley camp, Bres said.

Now, juniors who want to join can bypass those first two classes, Shoemaker said. If they have been in the Army Reserves or National Guard, they already have the training covered in the first half of the ROTC program.

Juniors with no military experience can make up the classes by attending Camp Challenge in Fort Knox, Ky., during the summer between their junior and senior years, he said.

After someone completes the ROTC program, he or she is commissioned as a second lieutenant and must serve eight years, Bres said. Previous reserves experience counts toward this.

These eight years can mean active duty, reserves or a combination of the two, he said.

One misconception is that graduates must go straight into active duty, Shoemaker said. Actually, they could participate in the active reserves, which requires one weekend a month and two weeks' training every year for four years, and then the Individual Ready Reserves for four years, he said.

"The Army is a good career choice," Shoemaker said. "Juniors who think it's too late for officer training should consider the two primary benefits — management and leadership skills."

"ROTC can bring out anyone's potential if he is willing to participate. There are many, many businesses that know this and actively seek out military applicants."

Soviet economist says goods faulty

MOSCOW — An influential economist says Soviet consumer goods ranging from cars to shoes are shoddy, old-fashioned or simply dangerous to use.

The economist, Abel Aganbegyan, head of the economic department of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, said the government is forcing down the price of outmoded and poorly made goods in order to make them uneconomical for factories to produce.

Soviet factories are responsible for meeting assigned production targets. This often makes managers unwilling to interrupt the flow of production to modernize or innovate.

Aganbegyan, considered close to Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev, criticized Soviet-produced cars, television sets, shoes and apartment construction in an interview with the weekly magazine Ogoniok.

In an effort to upgrade production standards, the government is forcing price cuts of up to 30 percent for goods that are of low quality or outmoded design, he said.

The factories that produce them are losing income, and the workers are losing the bonuses they get for meeting production quotas, he said.

The government also has been demanding higher quality products from about 1,500 factories. Goods that are not of high quality are not counted toward the factory's production figures.

Rebel forces gain in Sudan conflict

KHARTOUM, Sudan — The abduction of three American teachers and a British nurse has drawn attention to Sudan's largely ignored civil war, in which rebels backed by neighboring Ethiopia seem to have gained the edge.

The current rainy season and military morale problems have contributed to the shift of advantage in the contest between the predominantly Moslem north, which controls the government and army, and insurgents in the largely Christian and animist south.

Western diplomats and other observers say the change in favor of the Sudan People's Liberation Army occurred over about nine months.

"Militarily, it looks like the SPLA is in a stronger position," said Peter Woodward of Britain's Reading University, who has studied Sudanese politics for 20 years. "They're at their strongest yet" in the 4-year-old war, he said.

In a telephone interview from England, he pointed to recent rebel victories, demoralization of the army, disagreement among army leaders over the war policies of Prime Minister Sadek el-Mahdi and the government's inability to keep the army supplied.

Woodward said the rebels remain unable to win a military victory, however. He said the fighting could continue "for many years."

NATIONAL

Gay rights leader to serve on panel

WASHINGTON — A New York geneticist active in the gay rights movement has been named by President Reagan to a 13-member AIDS panel, administration sources said Monday.

The sources, speaking on condition they not be named, identified the panelist as Dr. Frank Lilly, head of genetics at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York.

The general telephone number of the college was being answered by a recording, and Lilly could not immediately be reached.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater declined to discuss the makeup of the commission, saying its members would be announced on Thursday when Reagan meets with the panel at the National Institutes of Health.

Fitzwater said the president would also visit a working laboratory and be briefed on AIDS research during a visit to NIH, located in Bethesda, Md., just outside of Washington.

Fitzwater said Reagan would give direction to the commission.

The president increased the size of the panel from 11 to 13 by executive order last week.

Poindexter denies 'pardon' meeting

WASHINGTON — John M. Poindexter angrily responded to Republicans' criticism Monday, declaring that he had conducted himself honorably as President Reagan's national security adviser, and that "I'm not going to be apologetic about it."

He said, too, that he knows nothing about a meeting in the White House last Dec. 16 at which — a congressman intimated — a pardon was discussed for Poindexter and his aide, Lt. Col. Oliver North.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said he unaware of such a meeting, but that a presidential pardon for Poindexter and North was considered in December as a means of getting them to testify before Iran-Contra committees of Congress.

Reagan decided to recommend a grant of immunity instead, Fitzwater said.

In four days of testimony, Poindexter has said he approved

Lt. Col. Oliver North's plan for diverting Iranian arms-sale profits to the Nicaraguan rebels but did not tell Reagan what he was doing. He said he wanted to insulate the president from political problems if word of the plan should leak out.

However, he said Monday, he periodically informed Reagan of certain aspects of the Contra resupply effort, and he said Reagan knew that North was the principal National Security Council aide on the project.

Smoking limited in state buildings

TOPEKA — State employees will have to watch where they smoke because of an executive order Gov. Mike Hayden issued Monday.

Hayden's order, which took effect immediately, requires that smoking be prohibited in executive agency offices except in specially designated areas. The order contains provisions similar to an anti-smoking law the Legislature passed in its last session.

"Smoking is the single most preventable cause of illness and death," Hayden said in his order.

The order specifically mentions six buildings: the Docking State Office Building, the Landon State Office Building, the Kansas Judicial Center and Memorial Hall, all near the Capitol, close to downtown Topeka; the state Printing Plant in north-central Topeka, and the State Office Building in Wichita.

Teachers to attend language institute

By ANNJELA HYNES
Collegian Reporter

Thirty high-school teachers of Spanish and German will have the opportunity to enhance their foreign language skills by participating in K-State's Foreign Language Institute for Rural Teachers.

The program is designed "to enhance their knowledge of literature and culture and to work for the incorporation of literature and culture into their teaching," said Loren Alexander, associate professor of curriculum and instruction and of modern languages.

Often, teachers "have not had direct contact in the culture," Alexander said, "so they appreciate an opportunity to gain knowledge about literature and culture and to find out about new techniques in teaching."

The institute is funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities in conjunction with the College of Education, the College of Arts and Sciences, Division of Continuing Education and KSU Foundation.

In March 1987 notices were sent to foreign language teachers and secondary school administrators in Kansas, informing them of the institute, which will begin in January 1988.

In response to the notices, 94 people requested applications, Alexander said. The teachers also had to submit letters detailing their experience in teaching.

Twenty Spanish teachers and 10 German teachers were chosen for the institute.

Doug Benson, associate professor of Spanish, said the teachers "would be able to contribute to as well as learn from (the program)."

The institute concentrates on teachers from rural areas — areas where they are likely to be the only foreign language teachers in their schools — who have not had many opportunities to study the literature or culture of the language, Benson said.

"We've worked very hard to get this mixture of backgrounds and level of skills," Alexander said.

The program will last one year and features three teleconferencing sessions in the spring and seven in the fall.

Jan Kruh, director of the Kansas Regents Network, said using Telebridge allows more flexibility as far as time scheduling. It is convenient and inexpensive, and teachers do not have to leave their school.

"It would be impossible financially and otherwise for all these people to get together...it (teleconferencing) probably played a major role in the acceptance of the proposal," Kruh said.

The program also features a four-week intensive summer seminar and a series of workshops in November, which will both be held on campus.

The teachers will be given a stipend of $800 for their travel and living expenses, Alexander said.

Alexander, Benson and Heinz Bulmahn, associate professor of German, will direct the program with assistance from two high-school teachers who were selected to be "master teachers."

These master teachers, Diane De-Neon of Blue Valley High School in Stilwell and Alice Wolf of Ottawa High School in Ottawa, will try techniques in their classrooms before they are used in the institute, Alexander said.

The 30 selected teachers will be presented with situational exercises to use in their classrooms to help students react to different cultures, Benson said.

"Every culture has its own way of dealing with the world," he said, and the exercises help the teachers teach their students to learn to function efficiently in other cultures.

Elisabeth Pardo, Spanish teacher at Manhattan Middle and High Schools, agrees that the institute is "a tremendous opportunity."

Pardo, who taught in a bilingual school in Costa Rica for 3½ years, said many teachers may know a lot about culture and literature, but "may not know how to teach it so that the kids can relate to it."

The institute, "is a unique opportunity to share with the other teachers and learn how to teach effectively," Pardo said.

Cancer stops fund-raising mail carrier

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

When Donald Marrs, a letter carrier from Cincinnati walked 2,200 miles to raise money for cancer research in 1981, he was fighting the battle of his life.

Marrs died of cancer Thursday, ending his battle.

In 1981, his fund-raising walk, the "Marathon of Hope," took him through Kansas, where he emphasized the need for intensified cancer research.

Prompted by Marrs' concern for the research programs at the K-State's Center for Basic Cancer Research, John Keltz, then postmaster of Galesburg, contacted three other postmasters in Kansas to organize a fund drive for cancer research.

Marlyn Miller, postmaster at Pomona, said Marrs' goal was to carry the flame of hope for other cancer victims and "to reach just one person, touch just one life."

With the money collected, Kansas postmasters initiated the "Donald Marrs Cancer Research Award" for undergraduate students at K-State in the Division of Biology, Miller said.

Terry Johnson, professor and director of the Division of Biology and the Center for Basic Cancer Research, said Marrs came to Manhattan in May 1985 at the request of Keltz to begin a fund-raising walk from Manhattan to Hutchinson.

"Don Marrs was an incredible individual," Johnson said. "He always thought of others before himself. When Don returned in May of this year to repeat the walk, he was right out in front of about 40 or 50 people. I had a hard time keeping up with him."

During the walk-a-thon, each person walked to collect pledges for the cause, he said. The money collected went into a scholarship fund for students interested in basic cancer research.

The fund drive this year netted between $3,000 and $4,000 in pledges, Johnson said.

"Our cancer research program is doing quite well," he said. "We are funded primarily by private donations."

"We compete for national grants with such prestigious schools as Harvard, Yale and Stanford. The amount of grants we receive has tripled in the last few years, so we must be doing something right."

The Center for Basic Cancer Research gave $3 million in scholarships last year, Johnson said.

James Miller, postmaster of Junction City, said the reason and intent of the Donald Marrs Scholarship Fund is to help further cancer research.

"The purpose of the walk-a-thon was to publicize the existence of the Center for Basic Cancer Research and to honor a brave and courageous man," Miller said. "We started the scholarship to honor Don Marrs. Now Don is gone, but the scholarship survives as a testament to his courage."

Adults seeking straighter teeth, dentists say

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

Brace yourself! Orthodontic treatment is no longer just for children. Adults are also looking to achieve a healthy and attractive smile.

Adults are realizing that properly aligned and supported teeth are healthier, easier to keep clean and more likely to be retained comfortably throughout life, said Dr. Charles Morton, Manhattan orthodontist.

"Approximately 30 percent of my patients are adults," Morton said. "I think they are deciding to get braces for a combination of both health and cosmetic reasons."

"A lot of people who initially thought their teeth were perfectly straight are really surprised to find out that they're really not properly aligned and could cause problems later in life."

Morton said not nearly as many people had the chance to have orthodontic care in the past as they do now. Some parents may not have been able to afford it, so the child had to wait to finance the braces himself.

"Cost is sometimes a factor because it takes longer for the adult teeth to move; therefore, we have to see the patient more often, which increases the cost," he said.

"The average cost in this area is around $2,600, but it increases a little more in the city. I have heard of fees quoted as high as $7,000 in places such as Beverly Hills and in Dallas," Morton said.

Dr. Pat Dreiling, another Manhattan orthodontist, thinks a lot of adults would have liked to have braces when they were younger but didn't receive the care they needed.

"Now, with both parents working, it makes it easier financially to afford braces for the child, but more adults are aware of what damage bad bone structure can do to themselves if the teeth aren't corrected," Dreiling said.

"People with a bad bite sometimes will experience headaches," he said. Both orthodontists said a number of reasons can contribute to bad alignment or an incorrect bite. Heredity and forces in the environment can cause problems for the teeth. Bad habits, such as thumb-sucking when the patient was a child, or accidents to the teeth can play a part in the formation of the mouth.

Morton said the average treatment time for an adult is from 24 to 28 months, depending on the rate at which the teeth move. Usually it takes less time to correct children's teeth because the mouth is still developing.

"One reason it takes so long is because the pain is often a little greater for an adult. You don't have that growth to work with, so lighter pressure is used on the teeth, which takes them longer to move," Morton said.

Morton and Dreiling said adult patients often feel self-conscious when they first wear braces but learn to accept them as an improvement to their overall appearance.

Accepting braces depends a lot on the patient's maturity, Morton said, but men seem to be more vain than women, and the decision to have braces often depends on their line of work.

"I treated one woman in broadcast journalism who simply wanted to improve her appearance to look more attractive on television," Morton said.

Mary Delgado, senior in architecture, said she sometimes feels self-conscious around older people because of the stereotype that only children wear braces, but her braces do not usually bother her.

Delgado, 24, has been wearing braces for two years and expects to get them off in the next six months.

"I had an overbite, but it didn't seem very bad. Now, I can tell a really big improvement," Delgado said. "If you need braces and you're a little older, I'd say go ahead."

Mark Jones, senior in engineering technology, 22, recently had his braces removed after wearing them for two years.

"I was a little worried about having to get braces at first, but after I got them, I found out that I wasn't alone and that there were other students with them," Jones said.

"Besides, it was my own decision to get them and I just looked at it as an improvement to my teeth."

Dreiling said the oldest patient he has treated with braces was 65 years old.

"It just depends on the health of your mouth. If the bone has already decayed a lot, I would not treat the patient with braces," Dreiling said.

Many people do not welcome the idea of being a "metal mouth," and some adults choose to wear less visible plastic tooth-colored braces, Morton said.

"However, plastic just isn't satisfactory. After six months, they turn yellow and discolored and look really bad compared to a clean mouth of shiny metal," he said.

Morton said lingual appliances, which fit on the inside of the tooth where they are less visible, were popular when they were introduced. But their popularity has diminished because of the high costs and discomfort to the tongue and gums.

"Ceramic braces look very promising in the future," Morton said. "Instead of metal, the brackets are made of ceramic, which match the tooth color and make them quite invisible."

"The brackets are chemically bonded to the enamel and once they're on, they're on. The problem is the manufacturers are having a hard time getting the enamel off the tooth, so they're still working on making removal easier and more comfortable. Within the next two years we will probably be using these exclusively compared to metal."

Salaries focus of engineering college

By DEBRA COUTURE
Collegian Reporter

Obtaining competitive faculty salaries and securing new laboratory equipment are the main charges in the College of Engineering's strategic plan, said Donald Rathbone, dean of the college.

"Faculty salaries are a major concern because we are certainly below our peers," he said.

Private industry is the college's biggest competitor for the salary, Rathbone said. Both need qualified engineers with high levels of education.

"We have had success in hiring good faculty despite the salary issue," he said, "but I doubt it can continue. It is likely that we stand to lose some of our faculty in the coming years, just as we lost two faculty last year."

Rathbone said in order to maintain the high quality of instruction, the salaries of the faculty must be raised to a competitive level.

"We are on the edge and could lose it all tomorrow if our salary situation doesn't improve," he said.

In the future, if resources are available, Rathbone said he hopes to receive money in areas that are underfunded. In addition to faculty salaries, another area is equipment, he said.

Planning Strategy In Higher Education

Colleges of engineering in the state of Kansas have not received any direct allocations for equipment over the past 10 years, with the exception of general university monies that were divided between all the colleges within the universities, he said.

At K-State, the college has done three things in the past to equip the college: used overhead monies from sponsored research; received direct, competitive grants from places such as the National Science Foundation; and received donations from private industry. This has been the main route of procurement, Rathbone said.

"Our college has 70 laboratories, and all of the curriculum is lab intensive," he said. "We have been reasonably successful but can't be expected to use these methods year in and year out to furnish the labs."

Much of the equipment coming from private industry is for specialized use and does not completely solve the equipment problem, Rathbone said.

A newer problem is computer hardware and software. It is a new expense that has developed in the last five years, he said.

"We are looking at $100,000 in computer hardware and software maintenance," Rathbone said. "We move where the growth is."

The computer and electrical engineering curriculums have more than 800 students and have doubled over the past eight years, he said.

"Computer engineering was just an option, but we changed it to a degree program due to the increase in demand."

Computer and electrical engineering curriculums will receive more of the resources until they are as equipped as the other curriculums, Rathbone said.

If one program is not as good as another, it doesn't give the student a fair choice in the type of engineering in which to major, he said.

"Basically, you would be destroying some departments, in my opinion, and the graduate programs would not be as good."

Although there is a sequence of aerospace engineering classes, an option in aerospace engineering may be added.

"We feel we ought to at least have an option in every discipline with the exceptions of mining and metallurgical mining," Rathbone said. There are special schools for these degrees in the geographic regions where the techniques are used.

Strides have been made in graduate level areas and over half the faculty is involved in research, he said, but the college must continue to grow in these areas. Rathbone said the state has not funded this college as well as needed if it is expected to maintain its current level and excel.

"We have a good national reputation in undergraduate education, and I want to have the same in graduate research and enrollment."

Students participate in 'Kool-Aid' test

By JACQUELINE JORDAN
Collegian Reporter

A recent study by a nutrition team at K-State indicates that people drinking an artificially sweetened beverage do not always lose weight.

Kathy Grunewald, associate professor, and Elizabeth Addington, graduate assistant, both in the Department of Foods and Nutrition, led a Kool-Aid study last spring to study weight gain and eating habits.

Addington said preliminary results indicated no significant change in weight or eating habits.

In a study published in a 1986 edition of the Preventive Medicine Journal, she said individuals eating or drinking artificially sweetened foods as part of their diet did not lose more weight than individuals drinking regularly sweetened foods.

Addington said another article in the May 10, 1986, edition of The Lancet, a British journal, indicated that several individuals' appetites increased after fasting four to five hours and drinking water sweetened with aspartame.

The marketing name of aspartame is Equal, an artificial sweetener. The protein, composed of two amino acids, is most commonly used in diet soft drinks, she said.

Addington said she doesn't have the final results of the experiment, which were conducted from late March through May.

But she said preliminary results on the Kool-Aid study show that there was no significant weight change in the subjects, although there was a difference of appetite between those drinking aspartame and those drinking sugar-sweetened water.

"We found that those students who drank aspartame had an increased appetite after one to two hours," Addington said. "Those who had sugar were sleepier....There were no significant weight changes throughout the experiment."

Moreover, the results indicated no significant difference in eating habits.

"What I was really checking out to see was changes in meals or snacking patterns...but we found no significant difference," Addington said.

Prior to conducting the study, Addington said she and Grunewald had thought people would not lose weight while eating less because they would snack on the side, thus maintaining the same caloric intake as when they followed their normal eating habits.

"I tried to find changes in eating habits but instead reconfirmed the results of the journal's study about the effect of aspartame on appetite," she said.

More than 90 undergraduate K-State students who enrolled in Food and Nutrition 132, a basic nutrition class, volunteered to participate and were randomly placed in one of three groups.

"We fed students 12 ounces of either pure water, sugar sweetened Kool-Aid or aspartame sweetened Kool-Aid," Addington said. "Students were asked to drink this before lunch between 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m., once a day, for 20 days out of 30 possible days."

Addington said students were given a set of questionnaires before and after the experiment. Also, their body weights were measured before and after the experiment to determine if any weight change occurred.

"Each 12 ounces of sugar-sweetened Kool-Aid contained 200 calories," Addington said. "This is about a little over a pound of weight gain in a month."

"The amount of aspartame in each 12 ounces of aspartame-sweetened Kool-Aid would be equivalent to the amounts found in, say, two cans of pop."

Higher education becoming a business

K-State students have made an important decision — to attend one of Kansas' institutions of higher learning. But just what does that term "higher learning" mean, what is the point of it and have we come to the right place to get it?

A university, we are told, is an epicenter of higher learning, a mecca for intellectuals, a sanctuary for those who wish to pursue knowledge for knowledge's sake. It is a place to hear all points of view, to become versed in the Western tradition, its mores and values, its concern for the human condition. By exposing ourselves to "higher education" and achieving a "well-rounded education," we are told, we are on our way to becoming better people.

All of this is quite wonderful. However, if

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian
Columnist

anticipated in many locales that a better-educated populace would offer inducements to commercial growth and attract capital investment."

Parenti goes on to write, "Far from being independent of the business world, the universities now provide...corporations with a wide range of services, are financially dependent on corporate endowments and private foundations, and have substantial investments in big business."

Assuredly, the business of a major American university is business. In return for funding, universities, particularly business colleges, provide industry with large, well-trained and obedient work forces with highly specialized knowledge. Academic research in physics, agriculture and chemistry serve the interests of defense contractors, agri-business and other corporate giants whose contributions, contrary to the notion of knowledge for knowledge's sake, control what areas are researched.

In "The Closed Corporation" James Ridgeway writes, "While the general citizenry may well believe the university interests itself primarily in educating students, in reality, universities are aggressive in advancing themselves as institutions in society.... Who would believe, for instance, that American universities could be a major factor in pressuring Congress to keep the prices of medicine high; that the patents to the high-priced drugs are held by such universities as Rutgers and the University of Wisconsin."

Although Ridgeway's analysis is almost 20 years old, it is still valid.

Take K-State, for example. While students are being versed in the Western tradition, striving to understand the human condition, and presumably becoming better persons, the University itself, under the aegis of the KSU Foundation, is profiting from investments in companies in South Africa.

Not that the people at the Foundation necessarily find acceptable a society deeply divided by race and class, as is South Africa, it's just that as a corporation, the Foundation is required by state law to invest wherever it can get the greatest return on its investments. That might entail investing in South Africa or South Korea, South Yemen or south of the border — in fact, wherever the resources are greatest and labor cheapest.

Of course, business foots much of the bill for "higher education," but to leave it at that is to ignore the fact that those who control the market place are also responsible for making the cost of "higher education" so outlandish to begin with.

I began by stating that K-State students have made an important decision in attending an institution of "higher learning." I'll conclude by suggesting they have a more important decision to make — whether to accept passively the flawed system whose interests that institution of "higher learning" serves, or whether to work toward an alternative definition of higher education under a different system.

New coliseum director has many good ideas

Now that the controversy surrounding the building of Bramlage Coliseum has settled down and the University community has come to accept the fact that the coliseum will be a part of our campus, the hiring of Charles E. Thomas as director of the center seems a positive and intelligent move on the part of the administration.

Thomas' plans to utilize Bramlage Coliseum as a center for Manhattan community activities as well as for K-State events seem geared toward making the most appropriate use of the building. If the coliseum is going to serve as many people in this community as possible, it is only wise to attempt the "balance of entertainment" which Thomas has announced he intends to schedule.

His foresight is to be applauded.

this is what is meant by the term, then perhaps we have chosen the wrong place to pursue "higher education." In modern America, the purpose of a university has never been the pursuit of such liberal notions. For students and faculty, a university is primarily part of a job process — either getting one or working one. For industry and the university itself, the purpose of education is to make money.

When Ronald Reagan was still governor of California, he once said, "Higher education should be looked upon as a capital investment...." Of course higher education as it is currently defined is largely a capital investment for students, but it is also a highly lucrative investment for the corporate interests which have successfully defined and controlled "higher education" since the Industrial Revolution.

In "Power and the Powerless," political scientist Michael Parenti writes, "The expansion of public education in the 19th century was an offshoot of industry's growing need for a more literate work force. It was

Impeach president

Editor,

The central motif of the latest phase of protection and cover-up of Central American interventionist policy is the litany of Iran/Contra witnesses railing against Congress' "vacillation."

While the vacillation has been compared to Hamlet's, one ought to remember that Hamlet's delay is explicitly for the purpose of giving him time to test the ghost's word and to see if the cause of revenge is genuine.

This is no more "vacillation" than Congress' deliberation and decision resulting in the Boland amendments, since Congress has a clear duty to scrutinize on an ongoing basis such a dubious cause, particularly since it was supported, and continues to be supported, by a zealous, dissent-stifling misrepresentation and control of information.

The analogy to Hamlet is more apt than its users intend. The Boland proscriptions were just as much the test of the genuineness of a cause, and despite Poindexter's and others' testimony of "knowing" the Congress would "turn around," support for the Contras was stopped without further notice or guarantee of later support, as is appropriate for a real test.

To assert "vacillation" is to assume that the best policy is to provide unconditional eternal support, which we do not provide our own government, much less the Contras. There is no charge of "vacillation" when the facts, and how they are managed by the administration, thus vacillated. The conditions of our support would clearly include circumstances such as human rights abuses. The testimony of North himself concedes this, as we learn of his attempt to manage the degrading spectacle of the Contras vacillating about whether or not to terrorize their own people.

We may conclude that the sequence of congressional decisions constituted a test, both of the Contras and of the Reagan administration. The Contras, demonstrating that, unlike the Afghan resistance, they would evaporate without our backing, failed the test, proving neither democratic nor popular. The administration, tested for its own democratic commitment, also failed, as we now see from its many mutations designed to thwart democracy when it doesn't go your way. These failures are sufficient reason to stop the aid.

The Shakespeare analogy has a final apt-ness. It is noble, passionate, boyish Laertes who, unqualifiedly supporting a villain, never engages in any Hamlet-like test of Claudius. As a result, he goes covert to join with the king in a sleazy plan to poison Hamlet, and dies dishonorably from insane revenge.

It is now clear that administration policy has visibly degenerated into revenge and punishment of the Nicaraguan people for tolerating and even supporting their revolution. Laertes had degenerated into Rambo, the influential cultural figure notably unmentioned in hearings. To suggest this is not trivial, considering our president's identification with a hero advertised as being above the law, our ambassador to Costa Rica Tambs' photograph of himself in the posture of Rambo with Uzi, and undoubtedly other instances.

This posture defines the administration's alternative to vacillation. Poindexter's "insulation" of Reagan was not to limit political damage, but to keep Reagan from having to enforce the law.

A strategic ignorance on Reagan's part calls for impeachment.

Smoking in Union

Editor,

I am writing with regard to the new state law concerning smoking and non-smoking areas in public buildings.

The regulation, as I understand it, prohibits smoking in areas not expressly designated for such activity. In particular, the carpeted area just to the west of the cash registers in the Union cafeteria seems to fall into this category.

Although this area has traditionally been a place for smokers, it is not currently so designated and ash trays continue to be provided, encouraging smokers to light up in violation of the law.

I urge the powers that be in the Union to take note of this and remove the ash trays.

It has always amazed me that the area closest to the food and most convenient to reach is reserved for smokers and that the rest of us had to carry our food through the smoke to find a place to eat. If this cafeteria must have smoking areas (and I'm not convinced that it must), let them be the areas to the back and sides which are now labeled non-smoking sections.

Contras lose on human rights

Anyone searching for the truth about human rights violations in Nicaragua faces a tangle of contradictory claims advanced by partisans of the Sandinista government and the Contras. It may be tempting to close one's ears in despair of finding an "objective truth," or else to safely occupy some middle ground between the "two extremes," as suggested by Jim McDonald (Collegian, July 14).

I recommend another approach. Those who are serious about getting to the truth should consult the findings of politically neutral human rights organizations.

Amnesty International, Americas Watch and the International Committee for the Red Cross are three such groups who do not take sides between left and right and who are exclusively concerned with gathering informational support for the release of individual victims. Most of their publications are available in Farrell Library.

The most experienced human rights authority on Nicaragua is Americas Watch. The organization's investigators are civil liberties attorneys who have no political axe to grind. They have published 10 reports since 1982 based on continuous painstaking research into allegations of Sandinista and Contra human rights abuses, and their conclusions are confirmed by the findings of Amnesty International and the Red Cross.

The information I present here is from the latest Americas Watch report, dated February 1987. Consider first the issue of how many political prisoners there are in Nicaragua, estimated at 10,000 by the U.S. State Department, and, coincidentally, by Brian Jones (Collegian, June 30).

After extensive on-site investigations, Americas Watch concluded that there is a total of 8,000 prisoners in Nicaragua's penitentiary system. Four thousand are there for common crimes. Another 2,000 are Somoza National Guard members imprisoned in 1979 for crimes they committed during the Somoza era. That leaves only 2,000 who could conceivably be "political prisoners." But in reality, the total must be much less than this, since the balance of 2,000 includes captured Contras, draft resisters, Contra collaborators, and some Sandinistas imprisoned for abuses.

JOHN EXDELL
Guest
Columnist

How many of these are bonafide political prisoners — i.e., individuals arrested simply because they exercised their right of political expression — could be determined only through a case-by-case review, something which no one has even attempted. Suffice it to say that the U.S. State Department and U.S. groups that support the Contras have, in the words of Americas Watch, "grossly exaggerated" the number of political prisoners in Nicaragua.

What about the record on war crimes? Americas Watch does document cases of Sandinista army violations against civilians and prisoners of war. However, their general conclusion is unmistakable. These occasional abuses "do not reflect a governmental policy to commit them or to tolerate them.... The government of Nicaragua does not engage in a pattern of violations of the laws of war. Nor does it engage in systematic violations of the right to life or physical integrity of detainees.... nor does it engage in a deliberate pattern of forced disappearances of persons."

Regarding Contra human rights abuses, on the other hand, "...the patterns of their actions have not changed. They still engage in selective but systematic killing of persons they perceive as representing the government, in indiscriminate attacks against civilians, apparently for purposes of recruitment as well as intimidation; a significant number of the kidnap victims are children."

This striking contrast between the conduct of the Sandinista army and the Contras is supported in a lengthy and vividly detailed June 1 Newsweek article written by reporters who spent five weeks traveling with both Contra and Sandinista troops.

The reporters found the Sandinista draftees to be well-disciplined, generally enthusiastic fighters respectful of the property of civilians whom they encountered. The Contras, by comparison, seldom engaged enemy soldiers, and in the main, their conduct amounted to "banditry" directed against farmers in the remote regions of the country.

It is not my intention here to whitewash the Sandinista human rights record, which is certainly imperfect; rather, I mean to expose the wild distortions of reality popularized by Oliver North, the Reagan administration and other Contra supporters who seek to demonize the Sandinistas.

The following conclusion is inescapable: according to the research of disinterested and professional human rights observers, the Sandinista record is far superior to that of the Contras.

Perhaps this conclusion will not move those who are determined to occupy the safe middle ground, from where they feel privileged to condemn all sides in this conflict.

But I urge these individuals to reconsider their neutrality. They should judge not from the tranquil terrain of middle America at peace, but by standards grounded in the historical practice of nations in conditions of military conflict.

Viewed in this light, they will find that the Sandinista human rights record compares favorably even to the historical performance of our own nation in times of war. The Contras, however, fail the test disgracefully.

Coaching softball a big hit

By SANDY SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Lisa Tatum, graduate student in education, is spending two nights a week this summer yelling, "Hit the ball, girls!" She is coaching a Jupiter League fastpitch team.

Girls in the 12- to 14-year-old age bracket have some unique characteristics that have made it an experience, Tatum said.

"What I like best is the progress at this level," she said. "When we started practicing two weeks before the season started, some of them had never touched a softball, except in a P.E. class."

"But at this age, they are ready for rapid improvement in coordination, so it's satisfying to watch."

Moreover, the girls have not fallen totally into the boy trap yet, Tatum said. This means they can concentrate on their coaches instead of the boys in the bleachers.

Their enthusiasm is fresh and unrestrained, she said. When a batter finally gets a hit, the entire team hangs on the fence and screams.

Tatum said she has watched older players clap loudly for home runs, but they might be reluctant to shout and hug each other over the least little thing.

The parents of this age group tend to be nicer, she said. Having coached younger girls in Nebraska, she has seen the pushy, defensive attitude some parents display when their child is on the bench.

"By this age, the parents pretty much know their daughter's ability," Tatum said. "Also, the girls are here because they choose to be, not because their parents have dragged them into sports."

Stacy Simmons, 14, has participated in softball since she was nine. In addition to playing several positions on Tatum's team, Simmons has a place on the Manhattan traveling team for that age group.

"If I didn't play softball, I'd go bananas," Simmons said. "A lot of my friends hang out at the pool, but since I don't like swimming, this is my main activity."

Tatum said she likes the coach-player relationship at this level, too. The 9-year-olds she coached in Nebraska had short attention spans, she said, but these girls listen respectfully to her.

Because they have not been playing that many years, they are not "know-it-alls" like some older players, she said.

Of course, not everything is perfect on a team this age, Tatum said.

"Sometimes the eighth graders put down the seventh graders, but I've pretty much stopped that," she said.

The league rules are helpful in creating a sense of equality because they require all the girls to play at least two innings, Tatum said. Those who do not start the game must start the next one.

Put-downs between teams are kept at a minimum, as well, she said. Rosters are assembled by ability before the season starts, depending on the 1-4 rating each girl receives from a previous coach or P.E. teacher.

Tatum said this prevents one team from slaughtering another.

Also, there are no set positions on many teams because the girls have not really specialized yet. The exception is pitchers. This keeps them from becoming possessive about where they play.

Another problem with age group is putting, Tatum said. Some girls do it constantly, but she simply ignores them.

Unfortunately, her players have entered the baby-sitting world by this time in their lives, she said. Sometimes this is more important to them than practice, at least when they can get away with it.

"All in all, the advantages far outweigh the disadvantages. We coaches don't get paid for this, so we have to love it."

Mattingly places team first, then batting records second

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Don Mattingly took the end of the streak in stride.

"I'm not disappointed it's over," the New York Yankees' first baseman said Sunday night after failing to hit a homer for the first time in nine games. "I knew it was over tonight one way or the other."

Mattingly had homered in eight consecutive games to tie the major league record set in 1956 by Pittsburgh's Dale Long. But in a 20-3 loss to Texas Sunday night, he singled and doubled in four at-bats.

"I think they wanted to see me hit a long ball," Mattingly said. "If I was a fan, I would have wanted to see it."

Mattingly, who doubled off Jeff Russell in his final at-bat, carried a .342 average into Monday night's game against the Minnesota Twins. He was named the AL's Player of the Week Monday.

"Russell showed me something," Mattingly said. "He came in right after me. He didn't lay one in, but he came in with his best stuff."

After the game, Mattingly appeared more concerned with the Yankees' loss than his failure to break Long's record.

"I just want to help the club," said Mattingly, the American League's MVP in 1985 and runner-up for the award last season. "It doesn't help them if I try for homers. ... You do what you can, but you do it for the club."

Long said he was proud to share the record with Mattingly.

"I can live with him," Long said. "He's an automatic .330 lifetime hitter. He's going to be one of the game's all-time greats."

In the first inning of Sunday's game, Mattingly grounded out to first base. He singled in the third and lined out to first baseman Mike Stanley in the fifth.

Mattingly's record-tying streak started on July 8 against Minnesota when he hit two home runs. On July 9, he homered against the Chicago White Sox's Rich Dotson and the following day he hit a grand slam off Chicago's Joel McKeon, which puts him in second place in grand slams for one season for the Yankees. Lou Gehrig hit five in 1927.

He hit solo home runs off Chicago on July 11 and 12. After the All-Star break, Mattingly hit two homers against Texas on July 16, including his fourth grand slam of the season. On Friday, he established an AL record when he homered in his seventh consecutive game, connecting against Texas' Paul Kilgus.

Six other American Leaguers had homered in six straight games. Reggie Jackson was the last, with Baltimore in 1976.

The Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y., has asked Mattingly for the bat he used during the streak.

Mattingly said the bat will be turned over "when I break it."

Crew shines in dim waters

By PRIMUS SINGLETON
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Rowing Association won five of seven heats Saturday at the Chicago Sprints in Chicago's Lincoln Lagoon.

"It was the best overall showing out of any of the crews that competed," said Don Rose, head coach.

Rose said that in rowing the emphasis is placed on winning an individual heat, then proceeding to the finals.

"If rowing were a sport that emphasized overall team standings, we would have placed first," he said.

In the first heat, K-State went up against the University of Chicago. After cruising to victory with a qualifying time, they were set to meet Loyola University of Chicago in the finals. The K-State team took the heat by two lengths, topping Loyola 3:10.3 to 3:17.5.

The women's varsity eight left the Lincoln Park Boat Club in their wake with a time of 3:59.7; however, that wasn't fast enough to qualify for the finals.

"It kind of hurts to win and not qualify," Rose said.

In the mixed varsity eight, which consists of four men and four women, K-State won 3:30.1 over the University of Chicago's time of 3:41.0.

Once again, K-State's winning time wasn't enough to proceed to the finals.

In the novice women's four category, K-State beat the University of Iowa, Iowa City, 4:48.9 to 6:56.4.

The K-State women's novice four crew advanced to the finals, only to be edged out by the Mendota Boat Club, which hails out of Madison, Wis. Their respective times were 4:37.9 and 4:20.5.

Rose said the K-State men's novice eight fell to the University of Indiana, 4:17.8 to 3:43.

"The men's varsity is the premiere race, and we took first place in it," he said.

Rose said during a race, he tries to encourage his crew to extend themselves until they are physically drained.

"It's hard to get people to put out that extra 1 percent, but I thought the varsity crew came pretty close to doing that in their final race."

The K-State Rowing Association's final race of the summer will be Saturday, Aug. 1, at the Gateway Regatta in St. Louis.

Indians win; Royals drop sixth straight

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Brook Jacoby went 4-for-4 in support of Phil Niekro's pitching Monday night and carried the Cleveland Indians to a 9-5 victory over Bret Saberhagen and the skidding Kansas City Royals.

Saberhagen, 15-4, was shelled for six runs on 10 hits in 3½ innings. He made his earliest exit of the season as Kansas City lost its sixth straight game. The Royals have lost 11 of their last 12.

Niekro, 7-9, won his 318th career game despite giving up five runs in five innings. It was his first victory since June 20. Doug Jones pitched one-hit relief over the final four innings for his first save.

The Indians, ending a three-game skid, jumped on Saberhagen for two runs in the second inning on Mel Hall's 10th home run of the season and Rick Dempsey's RBI single.

The Royals came back with three in the second. Danny Tartabull and Jim Eisenreich walked, Angel Salazar hit an RBI single with two outs and Larry Owen lined a two-run double.

New academic director hired

By The Collegian Staff

Athletic Director Larry Travis has announced the hiring of Mike Fisher as the school's director of academic services. Fisher will oversee the academic support program for all Wildcat student-athletes.

"I'm pleased to be involved with a program that already has demonstrated success in integrating academics and athletics departments," Fisher said. "Larry Travis has charged me with seeking further opportunities to increase the athletic department's involvement in the academic support of our student-athletes."

Fisher comes to K-State after spending the past two years as an investment broker in Lawrence. He previously spent eight years at the University of Kansas serving as academic adviser.

In 1984, Fisher was runner-up for president of the National Association of Academic Counselors. He has had more than 30 academic articles and reviews published in various professional publications.

Fisher is a decorated and wounded Marine veteran of the Vietnam War. He was involved in 12 combat operations as an infantry platoon sergeant.

Fisher holds a bachelor of arts degree in history and English from KU. He later earned his master's degree in English and his specialist's degree in history and English from Pittsburg State University.

In 1979, Fisher completed work on his doctorate in education and history at KU. He has completed 30 post-doctorate hours at KU in counseling.

Fisher also played football for the Jayhawks in the early '60s.

"Mike comes to K-State with tremendous credentials and extensive background in academic counseling," Travis said. "He was very highly recommended and exhibited tremendous leadership abilities while at Kansas."

He will join Steve Hall as a member of K-State's academic assistance unit.

A Special Church

맨하탄한인교회

It's Sunday morning.

Families greet each other as they ascend the steps. Children run between the pews before the service. The choir rehearses its song a final time.

Outside, the hot summer sun beats down on the peak of the building where pigeons busily hop about.

It's a typical scene.

The pigeons perched on the steeple don't seem to notice any difference. And really, there isn't any difference between this church and most others in Manhattan — except the language.

The Korean Church of Manhattan is the faith home for about 60 Korean residents of Manhattan. Formed in May 1982 as an offspring of the Korean church in Junction City, the church is of the Presbyterian denomination.

About 70 percent of the congregation are University students. Kyung Hee An, graduate student in computer science, said he found out about the church, as most students do, through the Korean Student Association.

"Through contact with others (in the Korean community), it's not difficult to find the church," said Seon Woog Cho, graduate student in chemistry.

The atmosphere of the church is friendly and open. Visitors are introduced, and a fellowship time follows almost every Sunday morning service.

In addition to regular Sunday services and Sunday School, the church holds an early morning prayer service on Sunday, Bible studies on Friday and Saturday evenings and a prayer service on the last Friday of each month. They also have a yearly revival meeting in conjunction with their anniversary.

Like other churches that follow the Christian doctrine, the Korean Church of Manhattan is active in missionary work. The church supports two small congregations in Korea, one of which is in the country. The other is on an island. It also gives financial assistance to a crisis center for the elderly in Manhattan and contributes to the American Red Cross.

A board of deacons and the pastor are the church's administration. Kap Chun Eitemiller, chief deaconess of the church, has attended the Korean church since its founding.

Eitemiller has lived in the Manhattan area for 10 years. Before the Korean church was formed, she occasionally attended other churches.

"This church is very special to me. My job (as deaconess) is to love everybody and keep everyone together," she said.

The major problem the church faces is the language barrier for American spouses and friends. The services are conducted in Korean, but translators assist Pastor Jin Sop Song during special services.

Song, who has served the church since its formation, said they are looking for a volunteer American pastor to assist with the service in English.

"We want to make a bilingual service so the spouses can understand," he said.

Chun VanDusen, a member of the First Christian Church of Manhattan, likes to attend the Korean Church to see her friends. However, her husband doesn't understand Korean so she visits only when he is unable to attend.

"I like to come to visit and hear the service in Korean, but my husband does not understand," she said.

The church is also trying to find an English tutor for the Bible studies as well as to help members understand and adjust to American culture, Song said.

About 20 new people come to the church each year. Typically, student members attend the church for three to five years before returning to Korea or moving elsewhere.

The Rev. Jin Sop Song gives the benediction at the Manhattan Korean Church Sunday morning. The Presbyterian church, formed in May 1982, is an offspring of the Korean church in Junction City.

'Grease' entertains audience

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

Rydell High is alive and well in Manhattan. Well, at least on the stage at City Park.

Last weekend, a 55-member cast brought the magic and romance of the '50s to life in the children's theater production of "Grease," a rock 'n' roll musical, as part of the Arts in the Park entertainment series.

The three nights of performance were the culmination of seven weeks of rehearsals. Since June 1, the cast had memorized parts, music and choreography while the technical and production crews produced the larger-than-life jukebox stage background.

Don Cukjati, Arts in the Park director and producer for "Grease" said more than 100 people were involved with the production.

"It's been a wonderful production. The kids have done extremely well and we've had a great crowd response," he said.

The children's theater production gives youth something to participate in other than the sports programs, Cukjati said.

"It's an excellent program for self-expression and individual growth," he said.

The children's theater productions are open to all area youth through high school age. Although many cast members had been in previous summer or school theatrical productions, Kent Kiracofe, a 1987 Manhattan High School graduate who played the lead role of Danny Zuko, had never been on the stage.

"There's a nervousness about being on stage but it goes away when you get with an audience," Kiracofe said.

Kiracofe, who was a member of the pops choir in high school, said his friends encouraged him to audition for "Grease." He plans to attend K-State this fall and major in pre-veterinary medicine.

Darin Simmer, a 1987 Wamego High School graduate, choreographed the show and played the role of Sonny, a brash, machoistic greaser.

Simmer, who had also done the choreography for the "Grease" production at Wamego High School, said it was a special musical because of the large cast and the closeness the cast members developed.

"It had a lot of ups and downs, but in the end it was great," said Simmer, who plans to major in social psychology this fall at the University of Kansas.

Pat Foltz, theater instructor at Wamego High School and fifth-year director for the children's theater productions, said the summer shows are different than school musicals.

"For the Arts in the Park show, we try to pick the fun stuff that uses a lot of kids," she said.

The production makes room in the show for all the youth who audition. In "Grease," the script called for 19 cast members, yet at times Foltz had 55 Rydell High Schoolers on stage.

Foltz said in last summer's production of the "Wizard of Oz," there were "munchkins all over the place."

The summer program is special because it allows youth of all ages to meet kids they normally wouldn't get to know in school, Foltz said.

The Arts in the Park series will conclude this week with performances by Mainstreet, a local band, on Thursday and Flash Cadillac on Saturday evening. Both shows start at 8 p.m. on the City Park stage.

Vietnam film depicts thick slice of combat

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reviewer

Some movies are made for people to watch and enjoy. Others are made for people to participate in and think about. Anyone leaving "Full Metal Jacket" without feeling drained and pensive has wasted four bucks.

Film Review

Director Stanley Kubrick ("Dr. Strangelove" and "A Clockwork Orange") has made a movie designed to relate the experiences of preparing for war and the war itself. However, the movie shows more than how bad the experiences was, is or can be. The movie also forces viewers to assess their feelings and reactions in light of what they are seeing.

The movie is divided into two parts. The first 45 minutes is almost a documentary on boot camp at Parris Island, S.C. The rest of the story takes place in Vietnam, revolving around Joker (Matthew Modine), a Stars and Stripes journalist. Though he is first introduced at boot camp, he does not assume the lead-character role until Vietnam.

Don't pay attention to anyone comparing this movie to "Platoon." They are two different types of movies. True, "Platoon" is a thought-provoking movie, but it is a story for watching. "Full Metal Jacket" is something in which the viewer is to take part. It is a twisting pathway through introspection.

The time devoted to boot camp is a good example. In most movies, boot camp scenes are little more than introductions which last about 10 minutes. In "Full Metal Jacket," the lengthy scenes and intense rantings and ravings of the drill instructor (M. Lee Ermey, an ex-Marine) make the audience not just see, but feel what is happening.

An alert viewer should be shocked with disbelief at the scenes, questioning his or her own ability to deal with a spitting, screaming, sadistic bastard. In many of the scenes, the drill instructor is yelling into the camera at the audience as if to say "I'm here to stomp you, too, Zipperhead!"

The lengthy boot camp scenes also help explain why soldiers in Vietnam were like they were. They were trained to be killers. They had to be to survive.

At the end of boot camp, the men have been stripped down and put back together again like machines. And like all machines coming off an assembly line, some will be defective. Some can handle it; others go over the edge.

After boot camp, the movie becomes more of a feature than a documentary, though it is no less powerful.

Through Joker, Kubrick takes the audience through the Vietnam experience. Whether it is seeing action for the first time, helplessly watching friends die or killing someone while looking into their eyes, the audience is not outside watching but an actual part of what is happening.

However, this is not the Vietnam we are used to seeing in the movies. The battle fields are gray, demolished cities, not dark, mysterious jungles. The feeling is haunting.

Jungles are naturally scary because most people do not spend much time there; hence, they are unknown to most of us. But most people are familiar with urban areas, and the once full-of-life cities reek of death.

The characters are also very different. There is no one, from Joker to the North Vietnamese, who represents good or bad. That conflict goes on not between characters, but within each character. Joker's helmet has "Born to Kill" scrawled across the front while his flak jacket sports a peace sign button.

When a gung-ho general questions him about it, Joker replies that it has something to do with Jung's duality of man. The line is almost a wisecrack, and it is also the point of the movie. There is something to love and something to hate in every character.

The experience is not just about the violence of war. Two very powerful scenes depict that war injures and kills in more than physical ways. The women playing Vietnamese prostitutes in the two scenes deliver wonderfully disgusting roles. If any viewer fails to think that in the given situation one of the women could be their mother, sister, lover or herself, then that viewer must be brain dead.

"Full Metal Jacket" is a must-see. I liked it even more than "Platoon."

Though a person cannot really know war unless he has taken part in it, this movie is a thick slice of life in combat. With "Full Metal Jacket," Kubrick has asked the personal question, "How would you react?" and shoved it down the viewer's throat. The honesty of the answer is entirely up to each viewer.

Local performer to make record

By PEGGY SHANDY
Collegian Reporter

Entering music contests, auditioning and preparing to cut a record has kept Doug Knight busy during this past year.

Knight, a lock system specialist at K-State, placed third in the KTPK Country Radio True Value Country Showdown Talent Contest held in early July.

"I entered last year's Country Showdown but didn't place," he said. "The talent this year was a lot better than before, and I was really surprised when I placed at all."

Knight said he enjoys singing for crowds and will probably enter another contest in a few weeks.

Involved in singing since second grade, Knight switched from rock music to country music a couple of years ago.

"At the time, I was with a band," he said. "When I wanted to change to country music, they didn't, and so I became a soloist."

When in Nashville earlier this spring, Knight volunteered to sing during the taping of a commercial at Opryland. After the taping was aired in April, he decided to enter the Nashville Network talent search.

Knight sent the network the required audition tape and was notified by mail that he had passed the first elimination level.

Flown to Nashville, he recorded a demo tape that will be reviewed by the selection committee in October.

Also keeping Knight busy is preparing for his first record.

"I've always wanted to cut a record," he said. "I've got this thing about hearing my voice on the radio."

After cutting the master tape after the first of August, Knight will select a promoter and an independent label with which to work.

Selecting a label and promoters are two of the most important items in recording a record, he said.

"To get air play, it (the label) should have a reputation for finding people," Knight said.

Bell choir from Japan to perform

By JENNIFER DORSCH
Collegian Reporter

The Glee Handbell Choir of Japan, an internationally acclaimed group, will present a concert Wednesday evening in McCain Auditorium.

The 7:30 performance will feature 15 ringers, ages 14 to 18, from the Meiji Gakuin Senior High School in Shirokane, Japan.

Joan Shull, handbell choir director at First United Methodist Church, Manhattan, said the group is more talented than any American handbell choir. Their musical success comes from dedication, technique and the director, Katsumi Kodama.

He will be giving seminars about musicality and polish in a performance as part of the handbell workshop at K-State this week. He joins Bill Mathus of Tulsa, Okla., in conducting the workshop.

"Katsumi is really a professional showman and makes the performance very exciting," Shull said. Kodama reacts to the performance in a very emotional way, sometimes dancing and sometimes finishing in tears, she said.

Officials claim law prohibits divesting

By SCOTT MILLER
Staff Writer

Although a nationally-recognized business and community leader has called for all U.S. companies to pull out of South Africa, the KSU Foundation has no plans to "divest," or remove its investments from those companies doing business in South Africa.

Last month, the Rev. Leon Sullivan, pastor of Philadelphia's Zion Baptist Church and a director of General Motors Corp., asked that all U.S. corporations abandon the guidelines set by him in the early 1970s for investments, hiring practices and community relations in South Africa.

These guidelines, known as the Sullivan Principles, have been endorsed by 125 U.S. corporations doing business in South Africa.

However, on June 3, Sullivan said his guidelines were having no effect on apartheid and called for all U.S. corporations to pull out of South Africa by March 1988.

Art Loub, president of the Foundation, said because the total amount of investments by U.S. corporations in South Africa is "minimal," to divest from corporations because they are in South Africa would not be "prudent management."

"We're not investing in South Africa. We're investing in U.S. corporations," Loub said.

As a private corporation, Loub said, the Foundation's primary responsibility is to secure the greatest return for investors, and thus, cannot legally divest. He said Kansas Law 17-5004, the "Prudent Man Rule," is the legal basis for the Foundation's policy concerning divestment.

"The Foundation is mandated by law to exercise fiduciary responsibility in investing. It's not our province to make social or political statements," he said.

After discussions concerning the University's investments, Dianne Urban, students' attorney, issued a statement specifying that the "Prudent Man Rule" states that "certain institutions and persons managing and investing property for others must exercise the judgment and care which prudent and intelligent investors use in the management of their own affairs."

In her statement, Urban wrote that the statute does not "automatically prevent divestment in South Africa, but its standards must be met during divestment process. Meeting humanitarian goals while fulfilling the investment standards might be possible."

The Foundation issued a statement from its Sept. 24, 1985, Executive Committee meeting that stated the Foundation's opposition to apartheid. But Les Longberg, controller at the Foundation, said apartheid could influence the Foundation to divest "only insofar as (they) affect the safety and security of investments," or the maximum return on investments.

However, at least part of the money controlled by the Foundation is legally student money, and could possibly be removed by Student Senate. Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said at least $487,811.89 of student monies is invested through the Foundation.

Longberg said because some of the student money was invested through the Common Fund, he was unsure how much of the money might be invested in companies with interests in South Africa.

The Common Fund is an organization chartered by Congress in 1971 to manage the pooled money of university foundations.

Longberg said the rest of student monies invested through the Foundation is in fixed-income investments.

"To the best of my knowledge, these corporations are not in South Africa," he said. "These are not the multinationals. I don't think they are big enough to be in South Africa."

Longberg said he did not think a student decision to divest would be either "prudent" because the companies in question are adhering to the Sullivan principles.

Shuping Coapoge, a spokesperson for the African National Congress of South Africa Observer Mission to the United Nations, said the Sullivan principles have not been effective.

Coapoge said the ANC has supported economic boycotts against South Africa since 1958 and has asked the international community to impose them since the ANC was banned from South Africa in the early 1960s.

Longberg said he thought it unfortunate that many companies have divested from South Africa. He said these companies had led the way in providing black South Africans with education and job opportunities.

"It's really too bad. Their absence is going to be detrimental," Longberg said.

Kehla Mdluli, a junior in business education who was exiled from South Africa in 1976 for involvement with a banned student group, said "very, very few" companies in South Africa have provided training and education for blacks and that those which have must "go through the government, which will not allow some changes to take place."

Loub said that divestment would be detrimental to black South Africans because it would mean fewer jobs.

Coapoge said that multinational corporations in South Africa employ fewer than 70,000 people. "As far as the ANC is concerned, 70,000 people out of 26 million is nothing."

Daniel Acheson-Brown, graduate student in political science who is specializing in Middle East and African affairs, said American companies are in South Africa for profit and not "for any humane interests."

"Companies which make claims of educating and helping blacks are insulting our intelligence. Foreign investment has helped prop up apartheid for years," Acheson-Brown said. "Sullivan himself has disavowed his own reformist principles and now calls for sanctions."

Mdluli said that although the immediate effects of divestment on some black South Africans might be detrimental, the majority would benefit in the long run.

"It's going to affect blacks to some extent, but it will also affect apartheid," Mdluli said. "I have family there that will suffer (from divestment)."

Jon Wefald, K-State's 12th president, recently celebrated his first anniversary. Wefald left his position as Chancellor of the Minnesota seven-university state system to take over from Duane Acker.

Wefald's presence changes attitude, administrators say

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

On July 1, 1987, Jon Wefald celebrated his first anniversary as K-State's 12th president. Wefald left his position as Chancellor of the Minnesota seven-university state system to take over from President Duane Acker, whose resignation took effect on June 30, 1986.

In his October 30, 1986, inaugural address, Wefald recognized that he was facing a challenge in accepting the University's presidency.

"We know that incremental budgeting, especially in an era of scarce resources, will lead to mediocrity," Wefald said. "We know that inevitably we will have to tie our planning process to our budgeting decisions."

Looking back on the events of his first year, Wefald agreed the University's financial situation was even more serious than he had realized at the time of his inauguration.

"The image wasn't good, the enrollment wasn't good and there was no strategic planning going on," he said.

K-State was forced to continue struggling as the state of Kansas started to feel an economic pinch. Almost immediately after the November election, Governor-elect Mike Hayden mandated a 3.8 percent across-the-board cut in the state's budget to compensate for a $13 million deficit. As a result, K-State's budget was reduced by about $3 million.

"No one expected that we'd be cut...in the middle of the fiscal year," Wefald said. "You cannot lose $3 million out of an already inadequate budget and not feel dramatic repercussions."

Wefald's most important task from the start was to stop the decline in enrollment, said David Schafer, professor in extension animal science and the 1986-87 Faculty Senate chairman.

"I think it was made fairly clear during the interview process that there was considerable concern over the declining enrollment and its affect on a decrease in funding and morale," Schafer said.

Jerome Frieman, professor of psychology who served as director of the KSU Presidential Search Committee, said Wefald has certain qualities that made him the best choice to solve K-State's problems.

"One of the things that came across immediately was his enthusiasm," Frieman said. "He had relevant experience, since he served as the president of a small college, which he turned around. He also had a genuine interest in and an understanding of the roles of a land-grant university."

Wefald said he has discovered that even without the state budget problems, K-State still would not have a satisfactory budget.

"Higher education in Kansas is just pathetically funded," Wefald said. "I now know that, having been here for a year."

"The highest priority to me right now is to improve faculty salaries. I guess one of the surprises for me during this first year was the recognition of the incredibly low salaries of the faculty here at K-State, which is true for KU and Wichita State, as well."

In Schafer's statement of expectation of Wefald at the inauguration, Schafer referred to the K-State faculty as a team, saying, "We share your determination to make this an even better University."

Schafer said Faculty Senate continues to be a team and wants to support Wefald, but increased support for the faculty must now be a priority.

Wefald referred to a study conducted by the Bureau of Business and Economic Research at the University of Nevada at Reno. The study provided a comparative analysis of faculty salaries at the nation's principal land-grant universities. The rankings showed the Kansas faculty salaries to be the second lowest of 50 land-grant institutions in the nation.

"The (Kansas) Board of Regents is working very hard to get the Legislature and governor to realize that (satisfactory funding of higher education) must be a priority of the next session," Wefald said. "If the state has any funds at all, (the state institutions) are really going to try to get our fair share."

Contracts to expand Fort Riley

By ELTON MAYFIELD
Collegian Reporter

The completion of a three-year construction program at Fort Riley will bring over $22.3 million worth of new buildings and improvements.

The total cost is spread out over three main contracts, said Bob Avery, resident engineer at Fort Riley. The first contract is the construction of six new buildings located near the current airfield.

The $6.7 million contract, to be completed by late August, includes two battalion headquarter and classroom buildings, one brigade headquarter building, two company administration and supply buildings and one central plant building, which will provide heating and cooling for the other five buildings.

The second contract is for the construction of two new aircraft hangers, Avery said.

The smaller of the two hangers, costing $6.1 million, will be completed in early spring 1988, he said, and the larger hanger, costing $6.9 million, will be completed during summer 1988.

"The smaller hanger will have a 13 1/2 acre concrete floor. The larger hanger, comparatively, will have a 17 1/2 acre concrete floor," Avery said. The hangers will both be used to house rotary aircraft like helicopters.

The third contract is for a tactical equipment shop at a cost of $2.6 million. Tactical equipment is the equipment the unit is assigned, such as trucks and tanks, Avery said.

The building, which will be located near the water tower that can be seen from Interstate 70, will be the building closest to the interstate when it is completed, he said.

"We are approaching 50 percent completion of the building," Avery said.

"Before any of these projects were started, there was a contract for the utilities to service these buildings. Once the utilities were in, we're able to start the construction of the various buildings now being built."

In addition to the buildings being constructed, Avery said they are waiting on the decision by the U.S. Senate to appropriate money for two additional buildings.

The proposed appropriation, totaling $4.85 million, is designated for the construction of an additional child-care center and another flight simulator, said Mark Meseke, media relations officer at Fort Riley.

Fort Riley currently has one child-care facility, Meseke said.

"With the new child-care facility we can care for an additional 300 children," he said.

The ages of the children who would be cared for would range from 6 weeks to 12 years old. "The facility would provide full-day, partial day and hourly drop in child-care," Meseke said.

The flight simulator will be the second flight simulator at Fort Riley, he said.

"Currently training is available on the UH-1 helicopters," Meseke said. "With the new flight simulator, training can begin on the new and more advanced type of helicopters."

Residents sell 'bed and breakfast' to tourists

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

Wearily travelers, tired of sleeping at all-to-familiar hotels and motels and sick of fast-food or convenience store breakfasts, have two homey options in Manhattan where locals open their doors to strangers with an extra dose of hospitality.

This new trend, bed and breakfast, is spreading throughout the United States, though it has been around for years in other parts of the world.

Phyllis Long, owner of Long's Country Inn, said she first heard of bed and breakfast when she lived in England and Scotland. She eventually started her own there and continued it after she returned to the United States.

Long offers contemporary lodging in a hilly, secluded area. Her home is at the end of a long, country lane and overlooks a fish pond surrounded by flowers. On her property are a swimming pool and red barn complete with riding horses.

"We have a great view and a peaceful atmosphere," she said. "We surprise a lot of people with our Colorado setting. They don't expect us to have hills in Kansas, and my house is in them."

Long's home contains eight bedrooms, three used for guests.

One-night double occupancy costs $30, with a required $10 deposit. She allows guests' children and pets.

"My home is especially adaptable for animals and children," Long said.

Neil and Betty Anderson, owners of Kimble Cliff Bed and Breakfast, visited some in Australia before Betty decided she wanted to open her own in Manhattan.

"I don't like working for other people," Betty said. "This is an independent, home-operated business."

The Andersons' home is a county historical landmark, built by a man with the last name of Kimble who came to Kansas to help build Fort Riley.

Kimble built the house for his son and daughter-in-law. He built a barn of walnut for his son and wife to live in until the two-story stone house, built into a hillside, was completed. In the house they used imported pine, which at the time was considered a finer wood.

"These days, people would prefer walnut in their homes," Betty said.

The young Kimble died after drinking contaminated water, and his sister and husband, by the last name of Wilson, moved in. When Wilson's wife died, he remarried and continued living in the house. Betty said Wilson's second wife, who is still alive, probably lived in the house the longest.

"A lot of people still refer to this farm as the Wilson place," Betty said.

A smokehouse and fruit cellar, built into a hillside, also remain.

"Our guests almost always ask for a tour," she said.

Betty uses two bedrooms for guests, one of which has a private entrance. Double occupancy costs $35.

"For a stone house, we have very large bedrooms," Betty said. "It surprised us when we first looked at the house."

The Andersons allow children in their home but not pets. They also don't permit smoking or liquor on the premises.

"I don't allow my family, friends or guests to smoke in my home," she said. "I only have lost two possible guests because of my rule. Since it's your home, you can set your own rules."

Bed and breakfast establishments don't require particular check-in times for guests. Due to state health regulations, it must serve a continental breakfast.

Both Long and the Andersons had large families at one time and have entertained a lot of guests in their

Leaders assemble, call for sanctions

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — The Organization of African Unity ended its 23rd summit Thursday urging member states to cut air and shipping links with South Africa and adopt other sanctions against the apartheid government.

Zambian President Kenneth Kaunda, the new chairman of the 50-member group, also scheduled a special summit Sept. 7-11 to discuss Africa's economic crisis.

The three-day summit concluded with a declaration adopted by the heads of state condemning South Africa's "racist regime and its policy of state terrorism."

The group's statement also urged member nations to prohibit imports of South African farm products, coal, uranium, iron and steel.

Previous calls for sanctions against the South African government have had little effect. Zambia and Zimbabwe last week backed off a pledge to cut air links to South Africa.

Resolutions adopted late Wednesday called for increased support of liberation movements in South Africa and South-West Africa, also called Namibia.

The document also criticized Britain, the United States and West Germany for having vetoed in April a U.N. Security Council resolution calling for comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa.

The statement condemned the Reagan administration's policy on Angola, where U.S.-backed rebels are fighting to overthrow the Marxist government.

Marchers fired at in Haitian capital

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Soldiers fired on 2,500 people who marched Wednesday in condemnation of the former Duvalier dictatorship's brutal private army, killing at least eight and wounding 15, witnesses said.

A stampede of screaming demonstrators fled the shooting, many breaking store and car windows as they ran. At least six people, including children, were trampled and taken to hospitals.

The march coincided with the July 29 holiday the Duvaliers dedicated to the Tontons Macoutes. The private militia disbanded and went into hiding after Jean-Claude Duvalier fled the country Feb. 7, 1986, but many now are believed to be in the army.

Reporters said three soldiers waiting at a major intersection fired into the crowd just after midday as the marchers moved peacefully toward the National Palace.

Protesters were shouting slogans against the Tontons Macoutes and calling for the resignation of Lt. Gen. Henri Namphy's governing junta, which replaced Duvalier's government.

Four of the victims, all young men, were killed at the intersection, and reporters said four other people were slain in adjacent streets. Radio Metropole said 10 people had died of gunshot wounds.

Reporters who tried to approach the victims were threatened by the soldiers, who pointed semi-automatic rifles and told them to go away.

Pentagon practice undercuts inquiry

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon allowed defense contractors to understate the costs of developing weapons, with both sides knowing a contractor could dip into other public funds to avoid abandoning the project, according to documents obtained Wednesday.

"Military officials may overlook or ignore infractions by the defense contractor, not because of an evil intent or for personal gain, but because of a belief in the importance that the project or the new technology has to the national security," according to a draft of congressional testimony prepared for Assistant Attorney General William F. Weld.

The practice has undercut the Justice Department's ability to prosecute some cases of alleged abuse, including indictments stemming from General Dynamics Corp.'s development of the Sgt. York anti-aircraft gun, according to Weld's draft testimony.

Pentagon spokesman Glenn Flood said the Defense Department does not acquiesce in advance to cost overruns. "We don't really enter into those types of contracts knowingly," he said.

President predicts nominee's quality

WASHINGTON — President Reagan predicted Wednesday that Robert Bork will find a place in history with the great Supreme Court justices of yesteryear, if only the Senate will give him an opportunity.

"I can't think of any better way of marking this 200th anniversary of the framing of our noble Constitution than by placing a justice of Robert Bork's quality on the United States Supreme Court," Reagan said.

Maintaining that "we are winning" the war against crime, Reagan told the National Law Enforcement Council: "I feel the American people want criminals going to jail while constitutional rights are preserved."

Without alluding specifically to the jockeying in the Senate among supporters and opponents of Bork, including talk of a filibuster on the floor and a delay in starting confirmation hearings, Reagan said that Bork, 60, "deserves to be evaluated on his merits."

Stephan rules out Sunday beer sales

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said Wednesday a law the Legislature passed this year allowing Sunday sales of 3.2 percent beer in restaurants does not permit carry-out sales.

In a non-binding legal opinion for Chase County Attorney W. Lee Fowler, Stephan said the effect of two measures that cleared the 1987 Legislature was to legalize Sunday beer sales for consumption inside restaurants if the practice is approved by city or county governing boards.

Stephan said a plain reading of the new law would seem exclude only sales of so-called cereal malt beverages for "on premises consumption" from the general ban on the Sunday sale of all alcoholic beverages.

"All other Sunday sales of cereal malt beverages not specifically authorized by the...exception are still prohibited," Stephan said. "Strained interpretations of the exception...should not be applied in order to circumvent or elude the plain meaning of the bill."

Doctors: Disease gaining virulence

BOSTON — Bacteria that cause gonorrhea are quickly developing resistance to another antibiotic, and the world may be running out of drugs to cure this common venereal disease, Army doctors say.

The researchers found that 8 percent of servicemen infected with gonorrhea in Korea had strains of the germ that could withstand spectinomycin, a relatively new drug for treating the venereal disease.

Experts expect that this resistance will eventually spread to the United States, where gonorrhea germs are already developing resistance to penicillin and tetracycline.

"We are beginning to run out of drugs," said Dr. John W. Boslego. "What's available currently is being diminished faster than we are replenishing it with new drugs."

Boslego, a researcher at Walter Reed Army Institute of Research in Washington, published the findings in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

At the U.S. Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, Dr. Jonathan Zenilman said the Army research is important, because it shows a direct link between increased antibiotic use and the emergence of bacteria strains that are resistant to the medicines.

"This has been hypothesized for a long time, but there has been a lack of good data to show it," he said.

Meese defends role in '86 investigation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Edwin Meese III, confronted by skeptical lawmakers, unflinchingly defended his inquiry into the Iran-Contra affair Wednesday and said he took offense at suggestions it was less than thorough.

Several senators on the Iran-Contra committees said Meese's questioning of CIA Director William J. Casey and National Security Adviser John Poindexter in November was too general and thus failed to elicit important information about their involvement.

Meese handled most of the interrogation calmly on his second and last day as a witness, but he bristled when Sen. George Mitchell, D-Maine, said he found it "difficult to accept" some of Meese's actions.

"It may be strange to you," the attorney general responded. "It may strike you that truth being stranger than fiction but I take offense at the idea that it's hard to accept, because what I told you is the absolute truth of what happened. And if there is any question in your mind, I want to get that settled right now."

"Well, no, as I just said, it's hard to accept," Mitchell said.

He also questioned Meese's failure to quickly seal and guard records in Lt. Col. Oliver North's office and thereby prevent document-shredding that North has testified he later did.

Wefald to visit Honduras, Costa Rica

By JACQUELINE JORDAN
Collegian Reporter

K-State is taking a global interest in becoming more involved with foreign academic institutions in Central America.

President Jon Wefald and Vernon Larson, assistant provost for international programs, are leaving Friday to visit academic institutions in Honduras and Costa Rica and are expected to return Aug. 8.

"It is important for K-State to have international relations," Wefald said. "The world is changing from a domestic market to a global market." Because of this, K-State needs to become more internationally oriented.

The schools they will visit are La Universidad de Costa Rica and a worldwide, independently funded agricultural school known as "the Zamorano school."

Wefald said the main purpose of this trip is to improve relationships with these institutions and to possibly recruit foreign students to attend K-State.

Larson said they will meet with the heads of the schools with which K-State shares agreements to create goodwill, foster other types of exchanges with students and professors and strengthen public relations.

Another purpose of the trip is to become more familiarized with foreign countries, he said.

Wefald said he is convinced an institution "is always better off if it has a diversity of cultural groups (because it provides the establishment) a better sense of history... (and the need) to be more sensitive to the world that we live in."

Larson said the importance of establishing international relations lies in establishing good friendship and providing countries with information while showing them what democracy is.

From a report written by Larson, four reasons explain why K-State is involved in international programs.

The first is a humanitarian reason. The report said the University should provide those countries in which the people are hungry with "material gifts."

Second, K-State can benefit from having students and faculty members become involved through teaching and research.

The report stated: "We believe that an appropriate mix of international students on our campus enhances the quality of education for the Kansas student. Likewise, having opportunities for our students to travel and work in other countries is extremely beneficial."

Providing opportunities for Kansas State faculty to be overseas can enhance on-going teaching, research, and extension programs."

"The world is getting smaller," Larson said. "It is important for K-State students to meet with international students because they will be involved in international job markets or travel during their lifetime overseas."

The third reason stated in the report is that K-State can benefit in agriculture by having University faculty work abroad to study solutions for stopping current diseases in livestock and crops.

The fourth reason is that the United States will benefit agriculturally by providing international assistance to developing countries, which in turn helps the U.S. economy.

Chernobyl officials receive hard labor

By The Associated Press

CHERNOBYL, U.S.S.R. — The three officials in charge of the Chernobyl plant during history's worst nuclear accident were convicted of gross negligence Wednesday and sentenced to 10 years' hard labor.

Three subordinates received lesser sentences in what were believed to be the first criminal convictions anywhere of nuclear power plant officials who failed to ensure safety standards.

Summing up evidence presented at the three-week trial, Judge Raimond K. Brize said no one appeared to be in charge at Chernobyl, where "people played cards and dominoes and wrote letters while they were on shift."

Thirty-one people are known to have died after an explosion and fire tore through the Ukrainian power station's No. 4 reactor, releasing a giant cloud of radiation that eventually spread around the world.

Soviet officials have blamed the April 26, 1986, accident on human error, saying the reactor blast was due to an unauthorized experiment during which safety regulations were flouted.

Chernobyl, 11 miles south of the power station, remains deserted except for officials overseeing administration of the plant and decontamination.

University selects new assistant vice president

By PAUL HONIGS
Collegian Reporter

From a field of four candidates, John T. Fairman has been selected as the new assistant vice president/director of University Relations.

"The academic reputation of K-State is what attracted me to apply," Fairman said. "The fact that K-State is a land grant institution was another aspect that attracted me."

Prior to coming to K-State, Fairman had served as the director of Public Affairs at Western Illinois University, Macomb, since July 1982. Management skills were a high priority for filling the position, said Pat Bosco, associate vice president of institutional advancement and chairman of the search committee. "We were looking for a proven manager with creative problem solving skills," Bosco said.

Bosco emphasized the importance of selecting a candidate with "global perspective" when working at a land grant institution.

"It is important, with our land grant mission to understand how one decision made at one level may have far reaching implications," he said. "Small decisions can have major repercussions."

In his new position, Fairman will report directly to Robert S. Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. Krause said Fairman understands the relationship of a land-grant institution to the public.

"We serve all the citizens of the state of Kansas," he said. "I think he (Fairman) understands that."

Krause said Fairman will be coordinating four functional units: University Relations, University News and Information, Printing Services and Photographic Services.

THANK YOU

Dear Students & Faculty,

Thanks for your patience and support during the months since the fire.

We have missed being able to serve you, but we hope you've picked up some real bargains during our fire sale.

As plans come together, we're getting very excited about our new store and teaching studios. We think you'll like them, too!

The plan is to be 'some-what finished' and functioning with our new stock (already starting to come in) by the time school starts.

We still have some fire sale bargains — records are 70% off or 5 for $10. amps and guitars 40% off.

Come see us at our new location in Laramie Plaza behind Eegee's!

Sincerely,

Development program enhances Kansas State

After reviewing the Kansas State Collegian's reports on each college's strategic plan for fiscal 1988-91, some goals have become apparent.

According to executives with the Kansas Board of Regents, the plans should promote fiscal responsibility within the colleges and prepare the University to meet the future.

Robert Kruh, dean of the Graduate School, said the plan represents what the school and University "can and should become."

Thus, strategic planning is an agenda of the University's long-term goals.

A main selling point of the plan seems to be developing economic ties between the University and the state through some colleges' programs. To accomplish this, K-State will follow its land grant heritage.

For example, Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, said they intend to utilize the college's instruction, extension and research aspects for economic development.

Closely tied with economic development seems to be a push toward strengthening the sciences. The College of Arts and Sciences will emphasize the sciences, and the College of Engineering will be pursuing funding for more lab equipment.

Faculty salaries are another priority. Through the Margin of Excellence, faculty salaries will ideally be raised by 8 percent to meet those of K-State's peer institutions.

One of the most blatant examples of inadequate salaries is the College of Veterinary Medicine. Out of 27 accredited schools nationwide, K-State's ranks 24th in professor salaries and 25th in associate professor.

But curriculums not directly applicable to business or industry are as important as technology-oriented programs for they provide a foundation upon which the others are built.

William Stamey, former dean of the arts and sciences college, realized the college has a responsibility to provide a total education because it "is central to all others." Therefore, the college will not diminish the quality of other programs to be able to improve that of the sciences.

David Byrne, dean of the College of Education, pointed out that these strategic plans should make the colleges "meaner and leaner" in their degree offerings to better define each college's purpose and equip them to deal with future changes in the economy.

Although it may be appealing to gear K-State's destiny toward economic development, Kansas' economic plight should not be the sole determining factor in the future of some University curriculums.

Developing a long-range plan was a progressive step and should be continued. But it will take true foresight to guide the University down a balanced path that will provide long-term benefits for the students enrolled as well as the state.

College could be a game show

I've been bothered about something as of late. It has nothing to do with politics, the Persian Gulf or even ABC's cancellation of "Our World". No, it's something much deeper than that.

For the past week or so I've pondered the existence of Game Shows. Why are there so many and what is their purpose in the greater scheme of things? You'll be pleased to know that I have found an answer. I know why more people are watching Vanna White than Dan Rather.

I believe it is because game shows are a reflection on life — college life in our particular case. After pondering and theorizing for hours I found many similarities between the two. In fact, the entire University system might be better served if it were run like one large game show. "The College Game" would guarantee excitement for all. Let me explain.

In many cases very little change would be required to make The College Game a reality. For instance, contestants are required to take written examinations before being on television (to weed out the idiots). Surprise, surprise, this procedure is already in place here at K-State in the form of SAT and ACT exams. This fact alone gets The College Game off to a running start.

Next, we'll need a host — someone semi-famous and congenial. Since Bert Convy is unavailable I suppose we could get someone closer to home to fill this important role. Perhaps President Wefald would be willing to be the ring-leader. In fact he could even wear a purple tuxedo.

We'll need a set. By the way, have you ever noticed how similar game show sets are? One set could be used for all the shows and practically no one would notice. This is where K-State fits the game show mold perfectly. The campus buildings will be our set. And since one pile of boring limestone looks identical to any other, it'll be easy to change locations when conflicts arise.

GARY LEFFLER
Collegian Columnist

Prizes, then, are the only thing lacking. No problem. Our grand prize will be a well-to-do lifestyle with a high paying salary and all the material comforts that accompany a large paycheck. Indeed, this grand prize is a Million Dollar Chance of a Lifetime.

So, all the preliminaries appear to be taken care of. But what kind of game show should this be — intelligent and sophisticated, corny and crude or simple and tasteful? The answer is obvious. A University is defined as many colleges under one roof. Therefore it is only natural that The College Game be many game shows under one large awning.

After the initial examinations to narrow the field of contestants, new freshmen will be asked to choose a major field of study. At orientation they'll face a giant Jeopardy board with the individual college names across the top and tuition amounts down the columns. Echoing throughout the Union will be the cry of, "I'll take Engineering for 800!"

The object of the game, of course, is to reach the top of the pyramid in less than 60 semesters and claim the grand prize. But not all of the contestants will be able to do so. Those not reaching the top will receive consolation gifts including an exercise bike, Rice-A-Roni and a year's supply of Lee Press-On nails.

During The College Game contestants will be quizzed, tested and quizzed some more. All True/False exams will be given Hollywood Squares style. Set in large lecture halls, the exams will be given on an individual basis with each student agreeing or disagreeing with the answers given by nine celebrities.

When taking a multiple choice exam students will initially be given a small stipend of money with which they may purchase vowels if they prefer. Naturally, "A" is the most popular vowel with "E" — all of the above" coming in a close second.

However, it should be mentioned that The College Game will not be void of any risks. The cost of appearing on the game is high and many contestants will face the real-life chance of landing on Bankrupt. Some contestants will Lose A Turn should they perform badly on the quizzes and be placed on probation.

The rewards for success, though, greatly outweigh any of the risks taken by our contestants. In fact, many of them will receive The College Game's bonus prize — a special appearance on The New Newlywed Game.

Finally, at the climax of our show, will come the exciting, tension-filled job interview round. One by one the contestants will walk into a sound-proof booth and sit beside a stuffy gentleman in a suit and tie. They'll talk and talk, answer and ask questions until the timer tic-tocs its way to zero.

And best of all, there'll be plenty of winners. Some will win smaller prizes, and some will win little or nothing at all (but still consider themselves a better person for playing). However, the big winners — those who walk away with a showcase of loot and furniture — will be those contestants whose qualifications come closest to the actual job market's needs without going over.

Ah, game shows. I suppose they have their place and time. And, yes, they might even find their place in the educational system some day. Who knows, maybe this fall we'll hear a strong, clear voice calling out to us, "This education could be yours...if...The Price is Right!"

Reservations on reservations

A few weeks ago a century-old issue threatened to surface and impinge on the public consciousness for more than a few minutes in the national news. Soviet eye doctors visited an Indian, Leonard Peltier, who has been convicted of murder and is serving his prison sentence in Leavenworth. Fortunately for the American ostrich, any real discussion of the merits of the case was quickly submerged by the ever present modern day scandals and the media's penchant for reducing news into tidy spots that will fit between the next commercial message. This allowed us to forget about one of the older scandals in our country, the treatment of the American Indian.

In the specific case of Peltier, both sides engaged in their little media fest and the actual facts were lost in the shuffle. The Soviet "propaganda" machine attempted to play to their people's and the world's prejudices as to whether or not Peltier was a "political prisoner". This is how things were portrayed in the American media at least.

The American "propaganda" machine was no less guilty in that they played to our own patriotic prejudices. The underlying tone of their coverage came across as — "Here in the greatest country on earth how could we have any political prisoners after all? It's obvious the Russki's are just playing to the world court with trumped up charges once again."

Before we comfort ourselves about the beauty of America's system and assume that if the Soviet Union says something it is automatically false we should look at the facts. Peltier was convicted of killing two FBI agents at the Pine Ridge Indian reservation in South Dakota. Since then serious questions have arisen about the fairness of the trial.

The most recent decision came from the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals which admitted that crucial evidence used against Peltier was not valid. This is a polite way of saying that crucial evidence involved perjury. Despite this the judges refused Peltier a new trial.

Also unmentioned in the current coverage by the media are the opinions of groups other than the Soviet Union. Members of the Canadian Parliament concluded that the imprisonment of Peltier is "clearly government abuse of the investigative process, suppression of evidence, and falsehood." Legal briefs seeking a new trial for Peltier have been filed by more than 50 members of the U.S. House of Representatives; by the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers; by the California Attorneys for Criminal Justice; and by diverse religious groups.

NEAL CLIMENHAGA
Collegian Columnist

Given these examples, why is it that none of this came up in the recent coverage of the case? Perhaps the national media found it convenient to play to our own preconceptions and ignorances, something that is unfortunately quite easy to do.

This is what leads the Soviet Union to conclude that Peltier is a political prisoner. Rather than risk opening a can of worms on the FBI's treatment of the case, the courts condone an unfair trial and the media goes along with glossing over the issues. This must fit the Soviet definition of "political" prisoner quite well and who is to say they are wrong in this case?

Given the history of the treatment of Indians in the United States, it would be surprising if they didn't think of themselves as being a nation of political prisoners. We may self-righteously condemn the system of apartheid in South Africa but our own treatment of the American Indian is identical and recently appears to be taking things one step further. Both the United States and South Africa created reservations for the native peoples of "their" country.

It is not surprising that there are parallels between the "reservation" system in the U.S. and the "homeland" system in South Africa since South Africans modeled their system after the United States' treatment of the Indians. This is one of the excuses South Africans use when attempting to justify apartheid. Understandably, they are surprised at our hypocrisy (or to be kinder, ignorance) about the realities of life for the Indian in the United States.

It is important that we, as citizens, be aware of situations such as this in our country. The treatment of the Indian is not something that took place in the history books, it is something that continues at this very moment.

According to Ward Churchill and Winona LaDuke in "Radioactive Colonization and the Native American," as recently as 1972 the Trilateral Commission at the behest of the Nixon administration proposed plans that would have designated the Four Corners region and the impacted region of the Dakotas, Wyoming, and Montana as "National Sacrifice Areas". These would be areas where radioactive dumping and use of ground water for industrial purposes (these purposes being the mining of uranium, half of the national supply which is inconveniently and coincidentally located on Indian lands) had rendered the region uninhabitable.

As Churchill and LaDuke put it "consummation of such plans would immediately eradicate Navajo and the so-called 'Sioux Complex' as reservations. The likelihood is that the peoples involved would cease to function as tribal peoples. Like the Klamath, who were 'terminated' in the 1950's and never recovered their Oregon homeland these newly landless nations would in all probability disintegrate rapidly, dissolving into the mists of history. By conventional English definition, such a prospect and such a process can only be termed genocide."

Actions and injustices such as these toward individuals and groups of Indians lend credence to claims that the United States is far from perfect on the issue of human rights. Perhaps the next time you feel a fit of patriotic fervor overtaking you, you should stop for a minute and consider our current history in regard to the Indians. If we all did this there might be some hope for real human rights instead of blind pride.

Leaders write new versions of animal-care shelter laws

By CANDISE LEONARD
Staff Writer

Maybe you can't teach an old dog new tricks, but state and local officials are rewriting old ordinances and creating new laws about animal-care facilities.

Chuck Murphy, director of the Riley County Health Department, and Su Bacon, vice president of the Humane Society, have developed ordinances to license "any kennel, pet shop, grooming shop, animal auction, performing animal exhibition or animal shelter."

"Hopefully, this will allow for a more consolidated effort for the health department in dealing with unwanted stray animals," Murphy said.

After Jan. 1, the Parks and Recreation Department will no longer administer the animal wardens and animal shelter, he said.

The proposals will be reviewed by the Board of Health Friday. If approved, the new ordinances will be presented to the city and county commissions, Murphy said.

Some of the issues being reviewed are the licensing of kennels, the question of restraining cats to the owner's property, registration of dogs and cats and the fees for impounding and adoption.

"The ordinances will give authority to the Board of Health to draw up specific rules and regulations governing the protection and keeping of animals," Murphy said.

Rep. Ginger Barr, 51st District, has re-introduced a bill to license and regulate Kansas animal-care facilities. The primary aim of H.B. 2220 is to bring animal breeders and dealers under state control and to improve the housing conditions for all companion animals, Barr said.

The bill was passed by the Legislature in 1986 but was vetoed by former Gov. John Carlin. Barr said the most opposition came from USDA kennels not wanting to be double-registered.

"We're going to try again so that good Kansas breeders and brokers will not have a stigma on them in other states about their products," she said.

Barr's registration plan includes five categories.

1. Pet shops will pay a $100 license fee and remain under the regulation of the Livestock Commissioner.

2. Humane Societies of first class cities will pay a $100 inspection fee and continue to be inspected by the Livestock Commissioner.

3. USDA kennels will pay a $25 registration fee and are inspected upon valid complaint by USDA and the Livestock Commissioner.

4. Animal dealers will pay a $100 license fee and are inspected by the Livestock Commissioner if more than six litters or more than 24 puppies are bred and sold.

5. Hobby kennels will pay a $25 registration fee and are inspected only upon valid complaint if they have three to five litters or less than 24 puppies or kittens yearly.

Barr said the new state law would bridge the gap between USDA kennels and non-licensed kennels in the state. She termed the current federal law, the Animal Welfare Act, as the "lemon law of animals."

The Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service is responsible for all functions under the law. Dale Wiseman, area compliance officer-in-charge, said it is difficult to "keep a good eye" on everyone because their funding only allows for 1 1/2 inspections each year.

"For the most part, Kansas is complying with the Animal Welfare Act," Wiseman said.

Linda Meredith, however, said she thinks there are "bad breeders." In the past few months, she has gathered USDA inspection reports on over 25 "problem kennels" in Kansas for Barr.

"We're not saying these kennels are bad — the inspection reports say so," Meredith said. "When you have kennels that you have to keep returning to inspect, it's a rip-off to the taxpayer."

Due to recent media attention on the issue of "puppy mills," Gov. Mike Hayden's office has recorded all responses during the past two weeks. Lois Hedrick, constituent representative, said Hayden's office has received 92 telephone calls

Student firefighters combine life-saving, studying abilities

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

Rescuing a nervous cat from a blazing basement has been one highlight of firefighting for David Chriswell, sophomore in veterinary medicine.

Chriswell is one of five current veterinary medicine student-firefighters participating in the three-year-old program. Though he may be reluctant to admit his involvement in recruiting the other four, Charles Tannehill, his battalion chief is not.

"We have to give a lot of credit to Dave, it has been beneficial for us to have a group with a common interest," Tannehill said.

Their common link began in the classroom and has been reinforced at the fire station. Though four of Chriswell's peers share his enthusiasm for animal health, the final member of the team, Chip Portz, is a junior in English.

Debbie Burns and Ann Bruce, both sophomores in veterinary medicine, fill two of the current positions for female firefighters. Burns is living at the station in the provided sleeping quarters.

"Part of the reason I took the job was because of the free housing," she said.

Burns said she enjoys her job and the people with whom she works. She learned about the job through Chriswell and was encouraged to apply despite the fact she had no experience.

Burns also said physical fitness plays a part in their training since the water hoses have a strong kick-back when full.

Chriswell, Portz and Sam Ives, sophomore in veterinary medicine, also live at the station. They share a kitchen and living room with Burns but have separate sleeping and bathroom facilities.

The department also offers a weightroom for all of the firefighters to use. This was disappointing for Chriswell when he first joined the department.

"I came from the Salina Fire Department where they had a dog, a pole to slide down and a ping pong table," he said. "It's no big deal, though."

Bruce and Mark Butler, sophomore in veterinary medicine, do not live at the station.

The program has the capacity for nine students, three females and six males, who must meet certain eligibility requirements.

Once hired, they begin a three-week training course where they learn cardiopulmonary resuscitation and become familiar with the equipment and the dispatcher's office.

Big Eight select team to play alumni

By The Collegian Staff

The Big Eight Select Basketball Team coached by Lon Kruger, will receive their first test on Aug. 13 in the form of several alumni-member of the Wildcat basketball teams.

The contest is slated to tip off at 7:30 p.m. Admission will be $3 for adults and $1 for K-State students, youth and senior citizens.

Highlighting the list of former 'Cats who are scheduled to take part in the game are Bob Chipman (1973), Eddie Elder (1985), Scott Langton (1978), Ben Mitchell (1986), Kevin Muff (1986), Steve Soldner (1979) and Chuckie Williams (1976).

Rolando Blackman (1981), Norris Coleman (1987) and Mike Evans (1978) have invitations sent to them as well.

Kruger will be coaching the Big Eight Select Team and he will be assisted by Wildcat assistant coaches Greg Gensing and Ron Stewart.

Members of the select team are: Charles Bledsoe (K-State), Jeff Grayer (Iowa State), Archie Marshall (Kansas), Steve Henson (K-State), Royce Jeffries (Oklahoma State), Mark Randall (Kansas), Beau Reid (Nebraska), Mike Sandbothe (Missouri), Gary Thompkins (Iowa State) and Scott Wilke (Colorado).

The Select Team will report to Manhattan on Aug. 9 and will practice here until the exhibition on Aug. 13. The following day, the team will depart to compete in the Beijing (China) International Tournament from Aug. 29-30.

Crew to compete in St. Louis races

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State Rowing Association will wind up the summer season when it travels to St. Louis, Mo. to compete in the Gateway Regatta on Saturday, Aug. 1. Competing will be the men's varsity, the women's varsity, the varsity mixed eight, the novice men's eight and the novice women's eight, said crew coach Don Rose.

The regatta will be held at the same site as the 1902 Olympic rowing events.

"It is a nice regatta," Rose said. "There aren't too many regattas in the Midwest during the summer and we have been having to travel around a lot. But this one's not too far away, and the men have to be considered one of the favorites after coming out of the Chicago regatta unscathed."

In other crew news, the United States Rowing Association has donated a $1,250 grant to the crew for a high school rowing program.

Retirement plan causes position freeze

By TRUDY BURTIS
Staff Writer

The state's cooperative extension service has put its hiring procedures on hold, said Bob Newsome, northeast Kansas area director.

The creation of a new personnel retirement plan prompted the freeze, Newsome said. All positions that are vacated between July 1 and Dec. 31, 1987, will remain vacant until Dec. 31.

Fred Poston, associate director of the state extension service, said so far 10 county agent positions have been left open by the freeze as well as 10 campus faculty-type positions. He predicts that by January, 12 faculty positions and 15-17 agent positions will be open.

"Out of 282 county agents across the state, 15 to 17 open positions doesn't seem like a lot, but it has a significant impact on a county to have an agent's position open," Poston said.

Under the old plan, the Civil Service Retirement System, neither K-State nor the employee pays social security. The fund was created by the University to contribute 7 percent to the employee's annual salary.

Poston said the new retirement plan, the Federal Employee Retirement System, will become an option for extension personnel Jan. 1, 1988. Under this plan, the employer and the employee both pay social security, plus the employer contributes 27 percent to the retirement fund.

Rather than having one plan replace the other, the two plans will both be available to certain employees, Newsome said.

"Personnel that were hired before Jan. 1, 1984, can choose between the two plans. Personnel that have been hired since Jan. 1, 1984, must work under the new plan," he said.

Poston said the old plan is more advantageous for the employer, but the two plans are mostly equal for the employees.

"In determining which plan is most beneficial to the employee, many variables must be taken into account," he said. "For instance, the amount of time in the old plan, because of the time and dollars involved."

"Another variable is the calculation of the return on social security—

"what will it be?"

The fact that some employees may choose between plans means the extension service cannot accurately determine the amount of funding that should be budgeted. The employees have six months by law to make a decision, which means the service will know the standing of every employee's retirement choice by Dec. 31, 1987.

Poston said the federal government has predicted that 40 percent of the employees will switch to the new plan, which will cost K-State $350,000 above the federal budget. However, Poston said the government may have overestimated.

"It's just a gut feeling, but I'm not sure the switch over will be as bad as the government predicted."

Attitude

Another of his goals is to increase enrollment — an important agenda item since he first took office. Wefald said he now believes K-State has the best admissions effort of any school in the state.

"We weren't getting into many high schools over the last 10 to 15 years, maybe 40 to 50 percent of them on a yearly basis," Wefald said. "Well, this year we got into every one of them, in some cases twice and in some cases three times."

"In the past, (recruitment) was more of an ad-hoc arrangement. Now I think we have a totally systematic approach."

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and director of enrollment management, said the actual results of the past year's effort to increase enrollment will not be known until the results of the final enrollment count taken on the 20th day of the semester is calculated. However, K-State's recruitment has been proven successful in one area.

"We have increased the number of National Merit Scholarship finalists and semi-finalists attending the University by almost 100 percent," Bosco said.

"(Wefald) made it a priority and sold the (KSU) Foundation on the idea of providing scholarships to any National Merit finalist or semi-finalist who wants to attend K-State," he said. "Then he sold the faculty and staff on the concept of actively recruiting the National Merit scholars."

Thirty-three of the scholars have enrolled this year, said Larry Moeder, associate director of Student Financial Assistance. Of that 33, 28 are finalists and 5 are semi-finalists. Last year, 17 finalists attended K-State.

Bosco said Wefald could have done nothing more to correct the problems that existed when he took office.

"President Wefald moved quickly and decisively, examining long- and short-term goals," he said. "He surrounded himself with good administrators and received good counsel, and he was willing to make whatever decisions were needed to make things happen."

Bosco said Wefald needs to remember the need for a continued effort to increase enrollment.

"We cannot lose momentum and be short-sighted regarding recruitment," he said. "If we are successful in increasing enrollment in the fall, we will celebrate, but we must continue our recruiting efforts and work on retention."

"Wefald must also continue his commitment to showing the faculty and students how much they are appreciated by the University."

Frieman said he believes K-State has had a successful year under Wefald's administration.

"(Wefald) has become the state spokesman for higher education, and he's shown strengths that weren't visible in the beginning," Frieman said.

One such strength, Frieman said, is Wefald's willingness to work with people to accomplish things.

"He wants people to come to him with a problem, and then he will ask them what they think should be done to solve it," he said. "Then he does what needs to be done."

Frieman said this year's budget was handled in the same way. Instead of allocating a set amount of money across the board to every department, funding was given selectively to achieve selective ends.

Frieman said this process was a sound way to run the University.

On the other hand, he said Wefald's tendency to want to solve a problem right away has one negative aspect.

"I don't know if it's positive or negative, but Jon isn't patient."

K-State's problems have not been eliminated, but Bosco said he thought Wefald's leadership has been a starting point.

"There must be a catalyst to create change, and Jon Wefald is a leader with the vision it takes to create change," Bosco said. "The things that have worked for us in the past year have worked in other places before, and someone just had to be willing to try both old and new ideas."

homes. They agree that the extra income is not the purpose of their businesses.

"I didn't open up my home to make money," Long said. "I did it because I enjoy people and showing my home. It's for the hospitality of it."

Betty said the best part of operating a bed and breakfast is meeting the people.

"I've met a variety of people," she said. "Mainly the kinds of people who like to visit with other people instead of hibernating somewhere."

Kennel, dog owners continue feud

By CANDISE LEONARD
Staff Writer

A dissatisfied consumer filed a report about her experience with a puppy from H&W Kennel Thursday with the Riley County Police Department.

Lori Carr, Junction City, has spent more than $70 on veterinary care for her strawberry cocker spaniel puppy since she received it from H&W on June 1. She told the police officer she thought the puppy's health problems were due to the "filthy conditions at the kennel."

"I just think it needs to be in the public light, that is why I'm filing this informational report," Carr said.

After reading the July 19 article in the Topeka Capital-Journal, John White, owner of H&W Kennel, said Carr was lying to the reporter.

"I can't believe she would say something like that," he said.

The incident began when Carr answered an ad for American Kennel Club registered puppies at White's kennel.

"It smelled really bad," Carr said. "I thought it was strange that he wouldn't let me go inside."

Carr chose the female puppy and negotiated the price of $125. She noted in her police report "there was dried feces present on the right side of the puppy's coat."

"That's not true. The puppies had been bathed," White said.

Carr said White offered to bathe the dog because he hadn't had time earlier. She decided to bathe it herself.

When Carr noticed crusty scales on the puppy's skin, she called White.

"Mr. White told me it was 'puppy fur' and would fall out and be replaced by a regular dog coat," Carr said.

The puppy was taken to the Jernigan Veterinary Clinic in Council Grove on June 8 where it was diagnosed with chorioptic mange, which is not contagious to humans. It was also infested with fleas. The 8-week-old puppy, Ellie, stayed two days for treatment.

"The mange could have come from another animal or from the mother," said Tom Jernigan, the veterinarian. He said he didn't think the dog could have contracted it from the older cocker spaniel at the Carr's residence.

Jernigan's opinion was that if the puppy had mange, other dogs in the kennel may have it, as well. On June 12, Carr phoned White to tell him about the puppy's condition and "to sterilize his kennel."

White said he told Carr that if there were any health problems in the first 30 days to bring the dog back.

"Why should I return her to him if he's not going to take care of it?" Carr said.

Carr requested a deduction from the price of the puppy, and she said it was agreed for White to pay half of the veterinarian bill.

White denied offering to pay half the bill. Instead, he said, he wanted her to exchange the puppy.

"I would have taken it over to Dr. Lewis to see what was wrong," White said. "I'm not stupid enough to sell it when it's sick."

On July 23, Carr contacted the RCPD with her complaint about her puppy from H&W. She was not the first person to have done so.

Two Humane Society officials and Ann Gonnerman, president of the National Society for the Protection of Animals, were given a tour of the kennel by an employee. Afterward, Gonnerman and Betty Townsend, Humane Society investigator, filed complaints with the police alleging cruelty to animals.

Gonnerman's report cited more than 10 problems she observed, including "broken and rusty wires, fly infestation, animals with no water or water in plastic containers that apparently hadn't been cleaned for a long time, cages stacked on top of each other with no barrier between them to prevent the animals from fouling the cages below, torn-up linoleum and cracked concrete that could be hazardous to the animals' health because of the inability to be cleaned properly."

According to the Animal Welfare Act, these are violations for kennels that are licensed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Dale Wiseman, compliance officer-in-charge at the Kansas Animal Health Department, has a statement from White stating he is not selling across state lines, thereby exempting him from federal licensing regulations.

Gonnerman, however, believes White is in violation of state law. If he is selling animals, he must be licensed by the state, which subjects him to the regulations. She could come back and give an affidavit so a search warrant could be obtained in order to gather fecal samples and photographs.

"I don't read (the statutes) to say that I can go in as the county attorney and demand to see what sort of conditions exist," said William Kennedy, Riley County attorney.

"The county attorney is an elected official and should be held accountable," Gonnerman said. "The people are the ones to get up in arms about animal abuse."

Kennedy said he wouldn't hesitate to file charges with regard to the cruelty-to-animals statute providing the crime could be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

State statute defines cruelty to animals as "having physical custody of any animal and failing to provide such food, potable water, protection from the elements, opportunity for exercise and other care as is needed for the health of the animal."

"I've got to really think I've got something," Kennedy said. "Given the health of animals in the wild, it would be difficult to prove animal cruelty to a jury."

The county attorney said that last September the case did not merit the attention of his office because the "conclusory statements" made by the complainants "could have had more meat."

In response, photographs taken of H&W by the Humane Society were submitted Monday to the county attorney's office, the health department and city commissioners.

Attorney: Pope faces legal battle

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — A lawyer representing a woman seeking child support from a Roman Catholic priest is threatening to sue Pope John Paul II and other church officials and entities, according to a story published by The Wichita Eagle-Beacon.

Lyle Britt of Wichita represents Margaret Ann "Peggy" Cameron, 33, a Wichita woman who won a 1984 paternity suit against Father Paul Francis Ziegler. She has a developmentally disabled 3-year-old child, Evonne, who Sedgwick County District Judge Montie Deer ruled was fathered by Ziegler.

Cameron was granted $1,000 a month child support, and Ziegler also was ordered to pay Evonne's medical bills and legal fees. He has been paying $100 a month in child support through the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services. Cameron gets $50 of that because she is receiving other SRS assistance.

The $1,000 a month child support award is unusually high because Cameron doesn't work. She once testified that Evonne's problems make it impossible to find a babysitter and that nurses are too expensive.

Cameron said Ziegler assured her in 1983 that if she became pregnant, it would be God's sign for him to leave the priesthood and marry her. Evonne was born a year later.

Faced with the reality of fatherhood, "He says, 'I think I've made a mistake' and 'Goodbye,'" she told the Eagle-Beacon.

That response triggered a three-year legal game of hide-and-seek with the priest and the Roman Catholic Church over child support and bills stemming from Evonne's birth defects.

When Pope John Paul II visits Texas in September, Britt says he may try to serve the pontiff with a civil suit seeking damages in connection with the conduct of Ziegler and the church.

Ziegler is assigned to an undisclosed parish in the Chicago archdiocese. He wouldn't discuss the relationship and couldn't be reached for comment despite repeated attempts, the Eagle-Beacon said.

Ziegler wants to forget about the situation, according to John Kightlinger, lawyer for the Redemptorist Order of which Ziegler is a member.

Attempts by The Associated Press to reach Cameron, Britt and Kightlinger were unsuccessful. Cameron doesn't have a telephone, and Britt's secretary said he was trying a case in court. Phone messages left with Kightlinger's office drew no response.

Fulbright recipient concedes guilt in falsifying 1981 U.S. tax return

By The Collegian Staff

Lincoln Diehl, professor of management, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court Friday to filing a false 1981 federal income tax return.

According to a statement released by the U.S. Attorney's office, "the government has evidence showing Diehl reported $42,654 total income on his 1981 tax return when he knew his income was greater. The charge did not specify how much income Diehl left off his tax return, and that information was not disclosed during the court proceeding."

In U.S. District Court in Topeka last Friday, Diehl was placed on three years probation, fined $5,000 and ordered to perform 100 hours of community service.

Diehl, who could not be reached for comment Monday night, will leave today for Tribhuvan University, Khatmandu, Nepal. He was awarded a Fulbright Scholar Grant for 1987-88.

U.S. Attorney Benjamin Burgess Jr. said defendants in criminal tax cases remain liable for all unpaid taxes plus interest and possible civil penalty in addition to any criminal penalty imposed.

Burgess said the charge against Diehl was the result of an investigation by the Internal Revenue Service criminal investigation division.

Kurt Shernuck, prosecuting attorney in the case, would not reveal how much money Diehl made that was not stated on his 1981 tax return. "There was no need to present (at the trial) that information because Diehl pleaded guilty," Shernuck said.

Yar Ebadi, head and professor in the Department of Management, said the only information he has about the case is from what he read in the Manhattan Mercury on Sunday.

"We need to study all the facts before anything is done," he said. "At this stage, I have not seen everything."

As a Fulbright scholarship recipient, Diehl will assist the Nepalese university in faculty development as well as assist the business community in Khatmandu.

"My job is to figure out what their academic program needs are and get them to let me do it," Diehl said in an interview last week. "I will check on the management associations in the community and try to figure out what seminars would help them and then ask to be invited to help them."

Tribhuvan University, a government-funded university established in 1955, is undergoing some restructuring.

"I will spend the first two months observing the interactions of faculty and students to get a background and assess their needs," Diehl said.

Diehl is familiar with international work. In the mid-1950s, he joined the faculty of Robert College in Istanbul, Turkey. From 1964-66, he helped the Iranian government set up the first department of economics and business administration. Diehl was in Nigeria in 1966, but when the war began, he returned to the United States. He returned to Nigeria in 1977 and developed a master of business administration program for Ahmadu

Study shows rural women have more health problems

By ALISON NEELY
Collegian Reporter

The notion that rural life is more conducive to good health and eating habits is false, according to "Health of Rural Women in Kansas: Personal Practices and Physical Status," a study done by the Agricultural Experiment Station.

"The activities they (the women) engage in are records and management. They are very seldom involved in labor," said Carol Ann Holcomb, associate professor of human development and family studies and the report's author.

Weight problems are directly related to education, she said. The better educated a woman is the less likely she is to be overweight.

The problem in rural areas is that there is very little education, Holcomb said. The rural Kansas county health departments are not large enough to provide health promotion/risk reduction programs. The private practitioners are occupied with illnesses and have no time to be health educators.

The study's purpose is to identify what kind of behavior affects the women's health. From this data, state and local agencies will be able to develop programs to modify behavior and prevent health problems.

As a group, women live longer than men but have more health problems. Acute and chronic illnesses create a greater productivity loss. Holcomb said the most common health problems are heart disease, arthritis and cancer.

Of the 636 adult women contacted, 65 percent were overweight, but only 46 percent considered themselves to be so.

From a range of 80 to 350 pounds, the average weight was 147 pounds. The average height was 5'4".

When compared with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. favorable height and weight standards, 35.7 percent of the respondents were within the desirable range. The moderately overweight women comprised 20.8 percent, and the obese 43.5 percent.

Six other health-related areas were researched for the report: sleeping, eating breakfast, eating snacks, physical activity, smoking and alcohol consumption.

Three-fourths of the respondents reported sleeping seven to eight hours per night. Older women and unemployed women were reported to be sleeping nine or more hours.

Almost 66 percent of the women eat breakfast, and 40 percent eat snacks. The practice of eating bet-

Police hold three at funeral march

SOWETO, South Africa — An assassinated African National Congress official was buried Monday in a ceremony attended by anti-apartheid activist Winnie Mandela, who confronted police when they detained three black youths.

Police limited the funeral to three hours and said no more than 200 people could attend both it and the burial.

Mandela, wife of imprisoned ANC military leader Nelson Mandela, hailed the deceased, Peter Sello Motau, 32, as a "brave man who died for the country he loved."

Motau was one of three people killed July 9 when a gang of white men fired on his taxi on the main highway in Swaziland. The other victims were ANC executive committee member Cassius Make and a Mozambican woman who had met the two ANC men at Manzini airport.

Dozens of youths led mourners in pro-ANC songs during the funeral and the burial. The ANC, which is attempting to overthrow the white-led government, has been banned in South Africa since 1960 and is considered a terrorist organization by Pretoria.

The July 9 killings raised to 11 the number of ANC members slain in Swaziland in the last eight months. No arrests have been made in any of the killings, which the ANC has blamed on South African death squads.

Police told news photographers and television crews they could not take pictures of the burial ceremony, citing "media regulations."

Gorbachev offers missile reduction

WASHINGTON — The United States was poised Monday to accept the latest arms control offer by Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev but to reject Moscow's demand for the destruction of American missile warheads in West Germany.

"That's definitely out," said a U.S. official here as American negotiators in Geneva prepared to formally accept Gorbachev's proposal to eliminate all U.S. and Soviet medium-range missiles in Europe and Asia.

The Soviets insisted last April that the Pershing 1-A missiles be destroyed as part of a treaty with the United States. The issue remains the principal obstacle to an agreement.

The missiles, which have a range of 465 miles, are in West German hands, but the United States controls the warheads.

Iraqi official says war may resume

WASHINGTON — Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz of Iraq warned Monday that unless Iran promptly accepted a comprehensive ceasefire his country might resume its attacks on shipping in the Persian Gulf.

Otherwise, Aziz told reporters after a meeting with Secretary of State George P. Shultz, Iraq would be yielding to Iranian "blackmail" by extending the voluntary 12-day moratorium while fighting continued on other fronts.

Aziz said Iran wanted "a partial halt" to the shipping war in order to continue its invasion of Iraq and to "get hold of the whole gulf region."

The foreign minister did not say how long his government would wait for Iran to respond to the cease-fire ordered last week by the U.N. Security Council.

Adopted unanimously by the United Nations Security Council last Monday, the resolution calls for an end to fighting on all fronts, on land and in the air, as well as in gulf waters.

Iranian officials have denounced the order as one-sided. But Charles E. Redman, the State Department spokesman, said that did not mean Tehran had rejected it.

Iraq voluntarily halted its attacks on merchant ships carrying Iranian oil and other supplies for Tehran on July 15.

Bork may assume seat temporarily

WASHINGTON — President Reagan could put Robert H. Bork on the Supreme Court temporarily if the Senate stalls in deciding whether to confirm Bork's nomination, Senate Republican leader Bob Dole said Monday.

Dole, calling Bork's nomination "the main event" in Congress this year, added an important new element to the political maneuvering over the confirmation battle in his pointed reminder to the Senate's Democratic majority.

The Constitution "allows the president to fill any vacancy on the Supreme Court while Congress is in recess and provides that the person filling that vacancy shall serve until the end of the congressional session," Dole, R-Kan., said in remarks to the National Conference of State Legislatures in Indianapolis.

Reagan promotes latest budget plan

HARTFORD, Wis. — President Reagan on Monday defended his frequent-flyer appeal for public support on federal budget and tax policies, saying he has no intention of spending his last 18 months in "a potted-plant presidency."

At the same time, Reagan, in three campaign-style stops in this Midwestern enclave of Republican Party strength, signaled he will give his so-called "economic bill of rights" a top priority during the remainder of his term.

The president, who has boosted his schedule of out-of-town trips in recent months amid damaging Iran-Contra disclosures, seemed to be answering charges by congressional Democrats that he favors getting away from Washington over negotiating a compromise budget for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1.

Captain of Stark to resign position

WASHINGTON — The captain and weapons officer of the USS Stark accepted responsibility Monday for the frigate's failure to defend itself against an Iraqi warplane and as a result, will be allowed to leave the service rather than face a court-martial, the Navy said.

Thirty-seven sailors died and 21 were injured when the Stark was struck by two Exocet missiles from the plane on the night of May 17 while on routine patrol in the Persian Gulf. Iraq called the attack a mistake, an explanation the United States accepted.

Capt. Glenn R. Brindel, the Stark's skipper, submitted a request to retire, the Navy said in a statement. Since he has served almost 22 years, he is eligible to request retirement with a pension, the Navy added.

Because he held the rank of captain only since January, however — less than the required three years — Brindel will have to retire at the reduced rank of commander.

Judge orders state to pay drug cost

TOPEKA — U.S. District Court Judge Richard D. Rogers ordered the state Monday to begin immediately paying for the drug AZT when physicians prescribe it for patients with acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

The order applies to all AIDS victims in Kansas whose doctors already have prescribed it, as well as those who will have it prescribed for them in the future. It will be in effect until Rogers hears arguments in the case later this year and decides whether to make his edict permanent.

The issue of state payment for AZT could become moot. Lawyers for the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services and the governor's office said they have been working toward a decision to pay for AZT for welfare clients with AIDS, but were concerned about the source of funds for it.

They said they believe the federal government is on the verge of providing grant money to help states pay for the AZT when it is prescribed by physicians in the treatment of AIDS.

New DIRECT line answers questions

By LORI SIEGRIST
Collegian Reporter

People searching for an answer to an economic or business development question can use the new DIRECT line, which stands for Development Information: Referral, Coordination and Training.

Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture and director of extension, implemented the program. If people want information on how to develop a new business in the area or needs an answer to a question about a business regulation, they can call the DIRECT Line.

"It's a classic example of how the system is supposed to work," said Sonny Sisk, extension organization and program leadership development specialist. "We're here to take the run-around out of economic development."

"We do the legwork, the door knocking, so callers won't have to run from door to door to find someone who can answer their questions."

DIRECT suggests to callers where to find the information or suggests the names of people who may help the business, Woods said.

Most of the callers can be referred to someone on campus to receive answers, Sisk said.

Bill Eberle, associate director of extension communication development, said the answers can be hard to find.

"Research can run from 10 minutes to several hours. As we come up with answers, we're developing a data base. The more calls we get, the faster we can respond," Eberle said.

"Response time for most calls is two to 24 hours," Sisk said.

"DIRECT is not a hotline where you call to get an answer with a crisis orientation. Our service meets people's needs after they've put some thought behind it," Eberle said.

"In extension, we like to impact people's thinking and knowledge. People have needs, which can be compared to fires," Eberle said. "What we are doing is organized firefighting. We answer those burning questions."

"This takes pressure off others in extension and communication development offices who may have had to respond to requests in the past."

Eberle said DIRECT does not have a toll-free number because most calls are from people who already own a business or are a member of a business that can afford to make the call. Also, he said, if the caller has to pay, it demonstrates a little bit of commitment.

Most of the calls come from individual businesses and manufacturing firms, Sisk said.

"Fifty percent of calls happen because the county agent referred the caller to our service or the question is passed on to us by the county agent himself," Eberle said.

The extension office began the service May 21 when it started a two-month testing period. Posters and brochures will be sent to county extension offices at the end of the period.

"We're doing our publicity campaign in steps, so we don't overload our ability to respond. We're still in a testing period, so we'll see what level the staff can handle. Right now, we could handle a great deal more."

THANK YOU
Dear Students & Faculty,
Thanks for your patience and support during the months since the fire.
We have missed being able to serve you, but we hope you've picked up some real bargains during our fire sale.
As plans come together, we're getting very excited about our new store and teaching studios. We think you'll like them, too!
The plan is to be 'some-what finished' and functioning with our new stock (already starting to come in) by the time school starts.
We still have some fire sale bargains — records are 70% off or 5 for $10, amps and guitars 40% off.
Come see us at our new location in Laramie Plaza behind Eegee's!

Laundry bar sells clean clothes, beer

By ELTON MAYFIELD
Collegian Reporter

In addition to washing clothes at the coin-operated laundry, people can now play billiards, test their video game skills, eat some food at the snack counter — and drink beer.

The only provision to drink beer is people must drive to a Topeka laundry.

Mike Jones is the manager and one-third owner of the Ichabod Laundry Bar in Topeka. Jones, Gene Cain and Mark Ward opened the laundry bar nine weeks ago.

"I know how boring it is to do laundry if you don't have anything to do," Jones said.

Clay Watahaw, owner of Westloop Coin-A-Matic, said even though he was in the process of building another laundry, he did not feel the laundry bar was a feasible plan.

"The percentage of the Laundromats that try a bar do not work out," Watahaw said. "Pool tables and video games usually just gather dust anymore. I don't see how a bar can be successful."

Jones said although they started the laundry bar during the summer school term, they have been satisfied with the business they have received.

"Although we have only been open nine weeks, we are close to breaking even," he said. "We are very excited about the possibilities when the regular school term starts."

Wendell Sack, owner of Suds Y'R Duds in Manhattan, said he had no plans to offer beer in his coin-operated laundry.

"I am in the laundry business, not the other (beer) business," Sack said.

Jones said his past experience as a bar owner prompted him to open the laundry bar.

"We surveyed the immediate area and the Washburn (University) campus and found the idea to be very receptive," he said. "I have been trying to get one (laundry bar) started for almost five years."

Latin debt hurting U.S. farm business

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

The money loaned to Latin American countries that cannot be repaid is affecting the farm economy of Kansas because those countries are trying to cut costs by not importing American products, said Jan Flora, professor of sociology.

The Kansas State Board of Agriculture will co-sponsor a special panel discussion in Topeka Wednesday on the effects of the Latin American debt crisis on Kansas agriculture.

The panel members involved in the discussion are A.E. Brenner, and Marc Coreia, two Brazilian farmers; Hara Lippman, vice president for international affairs with the Central Bank of Cooperatives; and Sam Brownback, Kansas secretary of agriculture.

Flora, who does research on the impact of the declining farm economy, and John Tincher, of the Kansas Independent Banking Association, will also participate in the discussion.

"The most recent figures I have show that the developing countries owe around $800 billion," Flora said. "Most of these debts are concentrated in Brazil and Mexico, with them each owing $100 billion. Other countries include Nigeria and Argentina, but they do not owe as much.

Flora said in 1979, the major oil price hikes caused inflation to rise and interest rates to decline, and encouraged U.S. farmers to buy more land. As a result of inflation, farmers were left heavily in debt.

At the same time, the high oil prices caused Latin American countries to borrow money from U.S. banks.

"During the late 1970s, the developing countries were buying oil and agricultural products from the U.S.," Flora said. "Around 35 to 40 percent of our ag products were going to Latin America."

"After Latin America (countries) found out they had such a large debt, they started reducing imports, which hurt the U.S. economy. The demand for imports diminished."

Because the United States' main exports had been wheat and feed grains, he said, states that produced primarily those crops were hurt the most.

"I think that the first step is to realize the connection between Kansas and the developing countries rather than having opposing interests in each other," Flora said.

Clinic provides home to stray animals

By TAMMY CARLGREN
Collegian Reporter

The Small Animal Clinic is more than an educational facility and veterinary clinic. It also provides a temporary home for unwanted dogs and cats.

The clinic has taken in countless dogs and cats that are either strays or are given up by their owner.

William Fortney, head of the small animal hospital, said the clinic began taking in the animals mainly as a community service, even though the facilities are not equipped to keep them.

"We're a regular hospital and educational center, not a shelter," Fortney said. "But if a person brings in a dog or cat, we can't just turn them away."

Fortney said the main reason the clinic keeps the animals is because the city animal shelter does not house cats, so there is nowhere else for people to take them.

If someone brings in a stray dog or cat or a pet they want to put up for adoption, a fee is charged along with an agreement. The clinic will keep the dog or cat for at least three working days before putting the animal to sleep.

Bert Parker, animal caretaker at the clinic, said the fee for bringing in a dog to be put up for adoption is $15 and $5 for each additional dog brought in at one time.

"This covers all vaccinations and boarding costs for the time they are here," Parker said.

The fee for bringing in a cat is $10 and $3 for each additional cat. If a person wishes to adopt a dog or cat, the same fee for the appropriate animal is charged.

When an injured animal is brought to the clinic, the staff applies minor first-aid treatment but will not treat animals that require major care such as surgery or other heavy treatment.

"We hate to turn down an animal that needs care, but if it is suffering, we have to do something about it. We just can't take on that responsibility," Fortney said.

He said the clinic started taking in the animals more than 20 years ago.

"There was just no place to take them, so people were just turning them loose. We thought since taxpayers were helping pay for the clinic that we had a responsibility,"

Fortney said. "Someone had to do it, and we were glad to fill that role."

Fortney also said that although they were glad to help the homeless animals, they were thankful for the new animal shelter that will be located in the industrial park.

"There is a real need for one centralized place for people to take these animals," he said. "Besides us, the city animal shelter, H&W Kennels and the Westside Veterinary Hospital were all sharing the responsibility."

Variety among faculty strengthens education

The K-State affirmative action program has been criticized for not hiring enough black administrators and faculty. In fact, the University has only two faculty members and one administrator who are black.

Leaving the usually lengthy debate about federally mandated affirmative actions programs aside, it is still apparent that the University should realize the important benefits a diverse faculty offers to the quality of the students' education.

Diversity in the ethnic and social backgrounds of faculty members is important in teaching students a variety of points of view and opinions. This diversity also gives students exposure to members of other ethnic and social groups. Exposure which some students may not otherwise have, and which can help dispel myths students may hold concerning members of a particular ethnic or social group.

This does not mean black professors, or professors of other ethnic or racial backgrounds, hold homogenous opinions or that they all teach in the same manner. Instead, educators — of all racial or ethnic backgrounds, including white professors — use their personal experiences and opinions to add flavor, diversity and substance to their teaching.

But even though each professor draws from unique experiences, a lack of racial and ethnic diversity among faculty members denies students valuable variety in their educational experiences.

In a university like K-State, where the faculty is basically all white male, students will not be exposed to a wide variety of points of views.

Miller sets the record straight

In her letter appearing in the July 23 Collegian, Nancy R. Manion, Adolph Coors Co. corporate communications specialist, claims my June 18 column contains "a number of false allegations and inaccurate information concerning Adolph Coors Co."

These are serious charges, to be sure. However, in her attempt to "set the record straight," Manion offers a number of interesting, though perhaps misleading statements. In the interest of democracy and free speech, I offer my own attempt to "set the record straight."

Item 1: Manion writes, "Coors signed pacts with representative organizations from both the black and Hispanic communities pledging a total of $560 million in job opportunities, contributions, scholarships, purchases from minority-owned firms and investments in minority-owned banking institutions."

Unless I missed something, the issue is not whether Coors gives money to minority groups. In fact, my column stated as much. The issue is under what circumstances these "pacts" were signed.

The May 20 Guardian, from which I collected part of the information for my column, characterizes these deals not as laudable contributions to minorities, but rather as pay-offs to leaders of minority groups in an effort to persuade such groups to call off several Coors boycotts. I believe the term used in the Guardian story was "greasing palms."

Item 2: Manion writes, "Rumors that Coors contributes to the Contras in Nicaragua are similarly false. Adolph Coors Co. makes no contributions to any such groups."

Had Manion read my column a little more closely, she would have realized that nowhere do I accuse the Adolph Coors Co. of making contributions to the Contras. What I did write was that Joseph Coors, the owner of the brewery, has given a good deal of financial support, including a supply plane, to the

Collegian Columnist

Contra-terrorists, or at least so he testified earlier this summer before the Congressional committees investigating the Iran-Contra debacle.

If Manion can prove that Joseph Coors has not contributed to the Contras, then perhaps she should take it up with the Congressional committees and special prosecutor Lawrence Walsh. I am sure they would be interested in possible perjury charges against her boss, as well as several former and present U.S. government officials.

Manion goes on to write, "Instead (of contributing to the Contras), Coors donates annually to many worthy causes, ranging from women's associations to universities and minority groups."

Beer preferences and apparent ideological differences aside, I must congratulate Manion on her ability to recognize CIA-backed terrorism in Central America for what it is — something other than a worthy cause. It is unfortunate, however, that her boss has failed to recognize this fact, as his financial support for such terrorism would indicate.

Further, had Manion provided a list of the "worthy causes" funded by Coors, it would include such "women's associations" as Phyllis Schlafly's right-wing Eagle Forum and such "minority groups" as Jerry Falwell's Moral Majority.

Item 3: Manion writes, "Coors does not discriminate against homosexuals. Sexual orientation is a personal matter we, as an employer, have no need nor desire to know." My information regarding this matter came from Perry Young's book, "God's Bullies." If Young's book is inaccurate (and I don't know that it is), then I offer my apologies and suggest the Coors people contact him to eliminate any future misunderstandings. Also, a former Coors employee who called me the day my column appeared was quick to point out she was not asked any questions about sexual matters when she took her lie detector test.

I thought that was a significant point. After all, it's not every company that will exclude from its potential employees' lie-detector tests questions about their sex lives. Of course, it's not every company that gives potential employees lie-detector tests either.

Item 4: Manion writes, "(A)nyone who is curious about how we do business is welcome to see for themselves. Barring the logistics of a trip to Colorado, we offer the findings of CBS-TV's '60 Minutes' and Mike Wallace, who came to Coors to investigate these very allegations. The findings...found no basis for the allegations."

Her carefree attitude toward pronouncement agreement notwithstanding, Manion's defense of Coors by way of Mike Wallace should not be taken lightly. It would be interesting to compare the "60 Minutes" findings, which I haven't seen, with those of the Guardian.

Manion finishes her letter, as one might expect, with a plea for free enterprise: "Thank you for this opportunity to put forth the facts. We believe Kansas State University students should have the freedom to choose between our beer and that of our competitors."

I could not agree more. In fact, I think it would be just dandy if several bars in this town would offer "on tap" alternatives to Coors. Until then, in the interest of democracy and "freedom of choice," I would encourage students, University employees, and Manhattan residents to refrain from drinking Coors.

Testing is positive

Editor,
I am writing to say that I agree with Stanley Koplik's suggestion of pre-enrollment drug testing ("Official suggests pre-enrollment drug testing," July 23 Collegian). Hopefully, it will do much to improve the quality of drugs currently available on the K-State campus.

Blue Key is yellow

Editor,
As a native Kansan who has done a lot of traveling throughout the United States, the issue of Kansas leadership has bothered me for some time.

K-State's Blue Key chapter seems as good an example as any. The issue over whether to profess belief in God and country as an organization is the supposed controversy ("Blue Key asks main office for constitutional revisions," July 23 Collegian).

The real issue is that of Kansans being able to decide for themselves what they want. In theory, this is possible. In practice, Kansans make a decision, then sit patiently waiting for a nod of approval from either the East or West Coast before proceeding.

Kansas has natural resources, money and some of the smartest people in the country. The problem is with our leadership. Our local institutions support organizations like Blue Key and turn out such gutless wonders as Kelly Welch who refuse to really take the lead come hell or high water. We follow these types of people evidently because of some latent feeling of inferiority.

I know enough Kansans to observe that membership problems are not caused by hang-ups concerning the belief in God and country. Blue Key members and leaders are simply scared of the opinions of those in other parts of our nation.

Be all that as it may, the least they could do is change their color name. Members have shown their true color and it is yellow.

Stay out of tunnels

Editor,
This letter is being submitted to you as a part of correctional actions taken by the Riley County Community Corrections

Department of Manhattan.
Several months ago, three of us decided to go "tunneling" in the steam tunnels under Kansas State University. We were caught. At that time we were frisked, handcuffed, arrested and taken to the Riley County Police Department for questioning.

Through the cooperation of the Riley County attorney we were able to negotiate a diversion contract whereas we were to complete the following within one month:

1. Pay court costs of $88.
2. Complete 10 hours of public service.
3. Write a letter to the Collegian explaining our punishment and urging others not to go "tunneling."

This punishment, however bad it may seem, was very lenient. We could have been jailed for six months and could have had to pay a fine of $500.

Moreover, the tunnels are dangerous; any of us could have been seriously injured. Also, tunneling is criminal trespassing, which is breaking the law. That in itself is not a good habit to get into. We were all very wrong and very stupid for breaking the law the way we did.

If you are thinking of going tunneling, I strongly urge you not to do so. It's dangerous to your safety, and risking a clean record. Think again.

Column is a cliché

Editor,
Regarding Scott Miller's recent article, "Higher education becoming a business," Wake up! Higher education is a business. Miller's grasp of the obvious is surpassed only by his flair for the cryptic. A more constructive commentary would provide at least one "...alternative definition of higher education under a different system."

California not a 'dream' state

JOLA MURPHY

Summer Life Editor

I've officially been everywhere now. After all my excursions to the East Coast, the South and endless weekends spent in the mountains and on the beaches, I thought I had saved the best for last.

For 23 years, I have built up a glamorous image of California that was inevitably too incredible for any state to live up to.

Last weekend, I spontaneously hopped on a plane bound for Los Angeles not knowing I was heading for one of the biggest let-downs of my life.

I've learned through experience that many of the best college memories derive from spur-of-the-moment decisions. Not in this case.

I was crammed into an overbooked jet, seated next to a California woman flying to Honolulu who gave every indication that she was tired and didn't want to talk. This was a difficult task for me since I love to talk and I do it a lot.

After three hours of keeping my mouth shut, the pilot announced over the intercom that we would soon be landing in L.A. I anticipated seeing this vast city below as we descended. Instead, I saw nothing but clouds and the airplane didn't break through the smog until the wheels were almost on the ground. And, to top it all off, it was raining!

Don't get me wrong, I know L.A. is a world of its own, but for a person like myself, first impressions are very important.

It's a little like reading the first chapter of a historical romance novel. There is an unwritten guideline the dime-store novel reader follows. The reader must establish exactly what the characters look like and picture the setting they are in. If this isn't established, the rest of the novel will be a maze of trying to put names with faces and the enjoyment of reading these smutty books just won't be there. You can never go back and pick that book up and start over because the first impression has already been made.

Well, my first impression of California had been made: Rain, 65 degrees, no one to pick me up in one of the nation's busiest airports and 900 people at the baggage claim, all looking for a light-blue Samsonite just like mine. Finally, my ride got there, I found my suitcase and we were off for what had originally promised to be an exciting weekend in Southern California.

On our way south, I was forced to experience the terror of the Los Angeles Freeway. For all I know, my claw marks are probably still in the vinyl upholstery of my friend's red Mustang. We were driving 75 mph, gas gauge on empty and 12 inches behind a white Vega with a bumper sticker that read, "Thanks for visiting California. If you're leaving, take someone with you."

Needless to say, by the time we reached our destination, Laguna Beach, I needed a Valium or a margarita.

I had been priming myself for Laguna Beach by watching the MTV Beach Bash which was being filmed there live one week before. The beach looked nothing like on television and Alan Hunter and Mark Goodman were nowhere to be found.

I must admit, the water was more blue than any I had ever seen but something was still not right.

It's strange, Fort Lauderdale was exactly how I had pictured and the same goes for the New England coast but the disappointment overwhelmed me when I heard that Laguna was one of the most popular beaches in Southern California.

The food was great and the people were more friendly than I had expected. No, I take that back. The people were great! On Saturday afternoon, I left my sunglasses in the bathroom of a service station in Laguna and I came back six hours later only to find the attendant standing there holding the glasses for me. I was impressed.

Our first day in the sun was not what I had anticipated. I was overwhelmed with children carrying kites and kicking sand and hundreds of surfers hogging the waves from the swimmers. Isn't there some kind of regulation limiting the number of surfers who can fit into one cubic foot of sea water?

These guys were great to look at, but when they open their mouths, the fun begins. They really do talk like that! "Hey dude. Did ya see me party with that wave? That was so feeble!" But I have to admit, I took my fair share of snapshots with them.

I was surprised to see so many not-so-tan bodies there. People in Kansas are more tan than some of those Californians.

The people were nice, the beaches were nice and the margaritas were very nice, but there was something missing. Maybe it was Annette and Frankie or Ken and Barbie. Sorry California, you're not for me.

In search of... Antiques

Walking in the hub of Riley's business district, one can't help but feel a tranquility only found in small towns.

Riley, a small town located about 15 miles northwest of Manhattan, has the indelible words "Made in America" stamped everywhere — under the smallest pebble, behind the tallest tree and in every board of the old wooden buildings.

Both sides of the two-block-long Broadway Street are lined with eight antique shops interspersed with other downtown businesses.

Off Broadway Street on a couple of Riley's side streets one can find three more antique shops.

To many, this seemingly congested little arrangement may appear to make matters highly competitive for the antique dealers, but nothing could be further from the truth.

Joanne Piper, co-owner of Carriage Shed Antiques, who operates her shop out of what used to be a filling station, said she feels having 11 antique shops in Riley has worked to the advantage of all shop owners.

"I think that you need that in antiques," Piper said. "It draws more people to our town because they know that if one shop doesn't have something that catches their eye, another will."

Most antique shops are overflowing with historical artifacts. Carriage Shed Antiques has living evidence of how different life on the Great Plains was during the late 1800s.

One interesting item that Piper has for sale is a "buddy" stove.

"They were used on the covered wagons for heating and cooking purposes and were fueled by buffalo chips," she said.

Trix Fasse, owner of Trix's Teeks, said it would be a coincidence if any two of Riley's antique dealers had the same antique for sale.

"Having 11 shops in town offers our customers a wide variety of goods," Fasse said.

Fasse usually can't be found at her antique shop because she devotes the majority of her time to her other business — the Calico Inn.

The Calico Inn, a down-home style eating establishment that is renowned for its thumb-sucking barbecued ribs, is perhaps what really brings people into Riley by the bus load.

"Quite a few tour groups come to visit the shops, and they usually want to eat (at Calico Inn)," Fasse said, as a bus load of Harvey County senior citizens entered the establishment.

Karen Lehne, owner of the Calico Cottage, an antique shop next to the Calico Inn, said that many people come to Riley to eat at the Calico Inn.

"It's good for the antique business," Lehne said.

Lehne, a newcomer to the antique business, has been in the trade for eight years. Lehne said she does it because it gives her something to do while her husband, Jim, who works during the night shift as a University police officer, sleeps at home during the day.

"It's difficult to live off of what you earn in this business because it usually goes right back into the purchasing of more goods," Lehne said.

In fact, most of Riley's antique dealers consider their businesses to be a supplementary income.

Cathy Welsner, owner of the Country Loft, which specializes in hand-made pottery and glassware, also helps her husband, Reg, operate a windshield repair business.

Welsner said the northeastern part of the country has traditionally dominated the antique trade, but now it is beginning to change.

"The East Coast's antiques are nearly all bought up. So many of them (collectors and dealers) are coming out here to buy pieces," Welsner said.

In the past, Riley antique dealers have purchased the bulk of their pieces at auctions, but this is no longer the case.

"Nowadays the auctions are highly competitive," said Piper, who has traveled as far as Canada to purchase pieces from other antique dealers.

"People (collectors) go to auctions and are paying a higher price than they would if they went to a shop," Piper said. "I think many of them just get carried away with the excitement of bidding."

While some antique dealers go to garage sales, Piper said people sometimes come to the shops with items to sell, which is another way of obtaining pieces.

Michelle Netson, Manhattan, carrying daughter Ashley, 9 months, comes out of "The Shed" behind Carriage Shed Antiques. Netson and her husband, John, spent the day shopping for antiques at Riley.

Dwayne Bolek, who along with his wife, Donna, is co-owner of Trash Barrel Antiques, said he doesn't go to auctions anymore.

"The collectors are outbidding the dealers," Bolek said.

Antique dealers are often confronted by customers who want to purchase the strangest antique pieces for the strangest reasons.

"A lady from Sweden came in one day and bought an old coffin," Bolek said. "That thing was that thick (gesturing about 2 inches) and made of walnut."

"She said she was going to use it for a corner cupboard."

'Robocop' better film than previews suggest

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

Every once in a while a film comes along that preview-wise, looks like garbage, smells like garbage, but surprisingly comes up smelling like roses. "Terminator" and "Crocodile Dundee" shared this distinction, but both will have to roll over and make room for "Robocop."

Film Review

Newcomer Peter Weller plays a hot-dogging patrolman named Murphy whose Detroit precinct is the back-drop for this futuristic allegory of corporate crime and punishment.

Though closely resembling a mega-budgeted "Six Million Dollar Man," the comparisons stop there. And while Murphy (the man) isn't given anymore than one-eighth of the film, enough of his infectious irreverence comes through and sticks. It's not until a robbery chase that results in his "death" that he's transformed into a mechanized man of steel.

Brainchild of budding corporate executive Bob (Miguel Ferrer) Morton, the Robocop project is an offshoot of a previous defective law-enforcement prototype called ED

209. Much to the chagrin of his superior Ronny Cox ("Beverly Hills Cop"), Morton, slimy opportunist that he is, pounces on what's left of Murphy and Cox's failure and proceeds to eagerly scale the corporate ladder.

Surprisingly, Robocop is a success. Not only with his fellow police officers but with parents and kids as well. The criminal community isn't impressed and tries to go about business as usual but soon finds out that's not possible with a cop that can't be bribed, killed or scared off like other members of the force.

When turned into a robot, his mind was supposedly erased but problems arise when the human part of the cyborg begins to remember shreds of his former life. Alas, his plight is like that of most high-tech, sci-fi dramas. There's a ghost in the machine.

He remembers not only his demise but his family (who was never told of the change), as well. Only when he meets a renegade cop and his former partner Lewis (Nancy Allen) do the pieces of the cybernetic puzzle begin to fit together.

The conglomerate powers-that-be approve of Robocop's performance until he starts to get too close to underworld ties that could inevitably link their own key executives to criminal misdeeds. This is when they decide he's outlived his usefulness and try to destroy him.

This endeavor proves much easier said than done. During one raid, he obliterates an entire warehouse of thugs quicker than Oprah Winfrey in a doughnut shop.

With only Bronson and Eastwood to show for our larger 'n life big screen idols, Robocop is a welcome challenger to the throne. He's impervious to bullets, can see through walls, interface with any computer, has a photographic memory and possesses his own mini-cannon. Clearly, he has no peer.

Rambo can't talk, Bond worries about running out of mouse, Dundee is just plain stupid and Oliver North can't even shred documents correctly.

If ever there's an instance of not judging a book by its cover, Robocop certainly qualifies. Despite the corny ads for the film and even the campy title, if nothing else, the film will surprise any moviegoer who expects too little. And knowing Hollywood, the sounds of another mechanism — the sequel-machine — are sure to be already turning. Like it or not, they've truly created a monster.

Recent theater hits, Reagan movie to headline UPC fall film schedule

By ELTON MAYFIELD
Collegian Reporter

For those people looking for excitement, romance, adventure and a possible mystery, the Union Program Council has just the ticket.

For the admission price of $1.75, members of the campus community can view a variety of movie hits this fall.

"Platoon," winner of four Academy Awards, including Best Picture, is director Oliver Stone's look at the Vietnam War. This war epic will be shown in Forum Hall Aug. 28 and 29.

"Hoosiers" stars Gene Hackman as the controversial outsider who bewilders and infuriates a small town, changes the lives of several of its citizens and challenges its youngsters to pursue an astonishing underdog dream. This midwestern favorite runs Sept. 18 and 19.

"The Secret of My Success" stars Michael J. Fox as a K-State graduate who goes to New York to conquer the business world and discovers there is no such thing as an overnight success. "The Secret of My Success" runs on Sept. 28 and 29.

"Bedtime for Bonzo" stars President Ronald Reagan as a college professor trying to raise a 5-year-old chimp as he would a child. See the leader of the United States in one of his earlier roles on Aug. 29 and 30.

In addition to previous hit movies, UPC has also scheduled two current hit movies.

"Raising Arizona" stars Nicholas Cage and Holly Hunter as an unconventional couple — she's a cop and he's a convenience-store bandit — whose overwhelming desire for a child leads them to redefine the rules of parenthood. See this film on Oct. 2 and 3.

The UPC also shows a variety of films in their Kaleidoscope, matinee and midnight films.

The Kaleidoscope International Films emphasize the most highly acclaimed films from all over the world, both old and new, said Arlene Barnes, UPC secretary. There are various types of films shown through the Kaleidoscope film series.

"Rope" stars James Stewart in Alfred Hitchcock's rarest, most intriguing and unprecedented movie.

"Creature from the Black Lagoon in 3-D" is a classic monster movie from the 1950s. An amphibious, prehistoric man-monster inhabits the depths of a mysterious tropical lagoon.

Midnight movies include "Fast Times at Ridgemont High" starring Sean Penn as the school clown/surfer supreme who has been "stoned" since third grade.

"Up in Smoke" stars Cheech and Chong in their film debut. Their humor keeps their spirits high and leads them to an outrageous finale at Los Angeles' Roxy Theatre.

Both Feature Films and Kaleidoscope films are shown as matinees. The cost for matinees is $1.50. Most of the matinees are shown in the Little Theatre, unlike the other films that are shown in Forum Hall, both of which are located in the K-State Union.

Fans of Flash Cadillac gather in City Park to hear the band Friday evening. The band, which was formed in Boulder, Colo., 18 years ago, has performed in Manhattan for the past four years.

Flash Cadillac drives music to responsive concert goers

By MICKEY FORNARO
Collegian Reporter

Arriving in a style befitting their name, Flash Cadillac drove to the concert in new 1987 Cadillacs from Murdock Chevrolet-Cadillac Co. The popular band played Friday night at the final Arts in the Park performance to one of the largest crowds of the summer.

Flash Cadillac, which made its fourth appearance in Manhattan, plays mostly 1950s, 1960s and 1970s rock 'n' roll. Sam McFadin, lead singer of the band, refers to their style as "Big Chill" music. The band also plays some blues.

In recognition of the group's long-standing popularity with the Manhattan people, a key to the city was presented to the band by City Commissioner David Fiser.

"It's a joy to play here," McFadin said.

The band started the night off with "Do You Like Good Music?"

The crowd insisted on an encore after the band played its last song, and the song "Shout" got the feet moving again during the encore.

There were people of all ages at the concert, from little children to grandparents. People even brought their dogs, and they seemed to enjoy the concert, as well. The concertgoers relaxed on blankets, lawn chairs or the grass. One Flash Cadillac fan commented, "last year it was a little louder but just as good."

The heat seemed to stop no one as they talked, drank soft drinks, ate popcorn and enjoyed a good concert.

When asked why she was there, one woman who had attended all four years said, "Flash Cadillac — I wouldn't miss it."

The audience was responsive to the band and showed approval in loud applause and yelling at the end of each song. This only seemed to encourage the band members to become more vibrant and energized on stage. They seemed to draw their energy from the crowd. During the last song people were standing, clapping their hands in the air and riding on other people's shoulders.

The six-member band, which has been together for 18 years, was formed in Boulder, Colo., in 1969.

Researchers decide memory loss not connected with increased age

By LINDA BRAUN
Collegian Reporter

If your roommate and grandmother claim remembering what's his name, don't worry. It's normal in both instances.

Age has little to do with declining memory, said Michael Holen, associate dean of the College of Education, and E. Robert Sinnett, a Manhattan psychologist.

Holen and Sinnett tested 100 people over the age of 60 for signs of memory loss and found there was little truth to the stereotype.

"Some healthy persons in their 80s sailed through every memory test with flying colors," Holen said.

Varieties of verbal and written tests ranging from simple to difficult were given. Some tests were so difficult that no one passed, he said.

Currently, Holen and Sinnett are working on ways of improving the testing instruments and shorten tests to aim them at the elderly. Holen said they hope to pick and choose from the existing assessment instruments, making adaptations for elderly memory testing.

"Right now, we're doing a lot of analyses and reports on the tests," he said. "We do see a need for new instruments to be developed and would like to start on them soon."

Holen said volunteers knew their memories were being tested and that they were expected to remember. Older people are more selective in what they want to remember.

"We wanted them to do the best they could," he said.

Memory impairment is one sign of Alzheimer's disease and Huntington's chorea. The development of more efficient memory tests would aid in earlier clinical diagnoses, he said.

Dr. Paula Davis at Lafene Student Health Center added Parkinson's disease to the list.

"The implications of these diseases aren't fully understood," she said. "Age is not proven to be a factor in the loss of memory."

Jari Wills stabbed to death in 'biker killing' outside club

By The Associated Press

OTTAWA — A former K-State basketball player was jumped by four or five members of a motorcycle gang in a private club minutes before he was stabbed to death over the weekend, the Franklin County attorney said Monday.

Jari Wills, 29, a native of Colorado Springs, Colo., who played at K-State during the 1978-79 and 1979-80 seasons, died of a stab wound to the chest Saturday morning.

County Attorney Wendell Barker said Wills apparently was attacked because of an incident in October when Wills broke up a fight between bikers at another private club where he worked as a bouncer.

The county attorney filed second-degree murder charges Monday, with an aiding and abetting clause, against Donald L. Burgess, 39, and his wife, Sherrell, 23, both of Ottawa. They were held under $100,000 bonds after appearing before Magistrate Larry Coursen pending a preliminary hearing Aug. 3.

Barker said authorities were still trying to determine who actually stabbed Wills during the fight. He said it is a "virtual certainty that more arrests will be made."

"This was a typical biker killing," Barker said. "Every report I've had of an assault involving this biker club has four or more of them ganging up on one person."

Barker said Wills was stabbed twice — once near the bar in the private club and once near the front door of the club. One wound was superficial, Barker said, but Wills was also stabbed in the heart.

Wills was killed, Barker said, because he "intervened in another one of the bikers' assaults." In that incident, the prosecutor said, two Ottawa men were attacked by four or five others as they were leaving another private club about closing time Oct. 11.

Wills played basketball under Coach Jack Hartman at K-State and was a student and assistant basketball coach at Ottawa University during the 1985-86 season. Before moving to Ottawa, he served as a student assistant at K-State and as an assistant coach at Coffeyville Junior College. He played professionally in France and the Middle East.

Meese to admit ignorance of arms sale

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Edwin Meese III first found out about U.S. arms sales to Iran from Lt. Col. Oliver North in January 1986 but will tell the congressional Iran-Contra committees he was uninformed about most aspects of the sales until last November, a Justice spokesman disclosed Monday.

North came to the Justice Department on Jan. 6, 1986, with a draft presidential finding authorizing such sales and gave it to Meese and then Deputy Attorney General D. Lowell Jensen to read, said Terry Eastland, a department spokesman.

Meese does not recall the meeting, but found a reference to it on his calendar, Eastland said. The attorney general continues to maintain he didn't find out about earlier 1985 arms shipments to Iran until last November.

The finding was the subject of an NSC meeting the next day, Jan. 7, 1986, and Meese's legal advice was sought for that, said Eastland.

"Contrary to what many in Congress will say, the attorney general was not that involved" in the Reagan administration's decision to sell arms to Iran, said Eastland, one of the aides helping Meese prepare for congressional hearings.

When he testifies Tuesday on Capitol Hill, Meese also will reiterate his contention that he was justified in keeping the FBI out of the Iran-Contra investigation until last Nov. 26, saying there was no hint of possible criminality when he and his top political aides launched a weekend inquiry of the arms sales five days earlier.

Meese, the administration's top legal official, will appear before the committees without an accompanying attorney at the witness table, although his handling of the weekend inquiry and other matters relating to the Iran-Contra affair are under investigation by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh.

The White House relied on Meese's legal advice in January 1986 to proceed with arms sales to Iran without informing Congress, according to some officials' accounts at the hearings.

Still, the attorney general says he didn't find out until Nov. 17, 18 or 19 that the administration had been engaged in 1985 in approving arms shipments to the Iranians through Israel. Meese says he didn't find out until last Nov. 21 that the CIA had drafted a presidential finding retroactively authorizing CIA involvement in a November 1985 shipment.

A Reagan-signed copy of that initial finding, which characterized the shipments as a straight arms-for-hostages deal, was destroyed the same day Meese says he found out about it, according to former National Security Adviser John Poindexter. Poindexter said he destroyed the finding after Meese called him to arrange for Justice Department officials to examine Iran documents at the NSC.

In other developments on Monday: —Senate committee chairman Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, said Meese will be followed by former White House Chief of Staff Donald Regan and Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger.

Two players join K-State baseball

By The Collegian Staff

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark has announced the addition of two more players to the Wildcats' roster for the 1988 season.

They are David Hierholzer, a 5-10, 155-pound right-handed pitcher, and Reese Beers, 6-0, 175-pound outfielder, from Bixby, Okla.

Beers is a transfer from the University of Southwestern Louisiana, Lafayette, while Hierholzer comes to K-State after playing at Johnson County Community College, Kansas City, Kan., in 1987.

As a freshman last season, Hierholzer appeared in six games, registering a 3-1 record with 2.70 ERA.

Beers, who played for Clark at Northeastern Oklahoma A&M, Tahlequah, in 1984 and 1985, will be senior in eligibility. As a center fielder, Beers compiled a .250 batting average with 24 hits, a double, a triple and nine RBI during 53 games.

Employees now need documents

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

President Ronald Reagan signed into law on Nov. 6, 1986, the act that makes it unlawful for employers to knowingly hire any alien not authorized to work in the United States.

It's name — the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986. And it imposes civil and criminal penalties for violations.

According to a notice published by Personnel Services, each prospective employee is now required to present documentation establishing both identity and employment authorization. For most people, a driver's license and a Social Security card are sufficient. But there are a number of other documents that can be substituted.

Richard Seaton, University attorney, said the act requires all employers to prepare and maintain considerably more paperwork on each employee than before. For those employers who have not hired a person who is not an U.S. citizen, it can seem to be nothing more than a burden.

"The purpose of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 is to protect a segment of our society, primarily Hispanics, from a discriminatory employment practice whereby alien-appearing people were screened more closely than others to prevent hiring of aliens," Seaton said. "Now, everyone goes through the exact same procedure, thus eliminating the need for any discriminatory employment practices."

Of course, this can work a slight hardship on those people who do not carry their Social Security identification card and on those who do not have a driver's license, Seaton said.

Certain documents can be substituted for these identification forms.
